THE first four books of this volume, which contain the progress of the war in the Netherlands, the establishment of the truce with the Dutch, and the expulsion of the Morescoes from Spain, are printed literally from the manuscript of Dr. Watson: nor has the smallest alteration been made, either in the arrangement of his matter, or in his style. It is, however, but justice to the memory of that author, as well as to the public, to acknowledge, that, in the two last, he had not the least participation. These were written by the editor of Dr. Watson's manuscript, at the desire of the guardians of his children. This was deemed an attention due to the curiosity of the reader; a curiosity which, in the present important era, may be supposed to be somewhat enlivened by the great events which have lately happened in the world.

It is evident that Dr. Watson has exerted in this work all that care to discover the truth, which distinguishes his History of Philip II. He has consulted the most approved writers on this subject: and by that respectable friend to literature, the Earl of HARDWICKE, he was favored with manuscripts of equal authority and importance.

The continuator of Dr. Watson's narrative has not thought it proper to give a detail of those hostile operations at sea, which were continued, beyond the line, even after the pacification of Antwerp. These operations, in his opinion enter into the Spanish History, by the most natural connexion, at the expiration of the truce; when the Spanish ministers compared the advantages and disadvantages that had resulted from that engagement, and deliberated whether they should prolong the peace, or renew the war.

The conferences now first published, between the Spanish and English commissioners, for effecting a peace between their respective nations, at London, in 1604, were carried on with extraordinary ability, decorum, and dignity, on both sides: and they serve not only to gratify a curiosity relative to their particular subject, but also, to throw light on the interests and views of the courts of London and Madrid, at that time; on the state of commerce; and the sentiments, manners, and general character of the age.

THE
H I S T O R Y
OF THE REIGN OF
PHILIP THE THIRD,
KING OF SPAIN.

B O O K I.

PHILIP the Third, King of Spain, son of Philip the Second, and of Anne of Austria, daughter of Maximilian II. Emperor of Germany, was in the 21st year of his age at his accession to the throne. He was a prince of a character extremely opposite to that of the late king, although no pains had been spared to form him to a similarity of manners. From the instructions delivered to those who had the charge of his education, it appears ¹ to have been a principal object of his father's attention, to inspire him with the same bigoted attachment to the superstition of the church of Rome, by which he himself had been actuated; and the means which he employed for this end, were attended with the desired success. But he was not equally successful manly exertion and activity ².

With this part of the young prince's character, Philip was well acquainted; and foresaw, with much anxiety, the unhappy consequences which it was likely to produce in his future reign. In order to introduce and habituate him to the management of public affairs, he formed a council of his ablest and most experienced ministers, who, in the presence of the prince, debated three times a week, concerning various important matters relating to the administration of the kingdom; and the prince was required to preside in this council, and to report the opinion of the majority to the king ³. But neither this, nor any other expedient which Loisa, the prince's faithful preceptor, could devise, proved effectual for the purpose for which it was intended. Inactivity or indolence still remained the most conspicuous feature in his character; and it early excited in the king, a strong and well grounded apprehension that his son, unable or unwilling himself to hold the reins of government, would surrender them into the hands of the marquis of Denia, or of some other favorite. Against this conduct, which is so commonly attended with the most pernicious consequences, Philip had often put the young prince upon his guard; and it was his last advice to him, which he delivered with great earnestness, a few hours before his death, that he should govern his kingdom by himself. He had likewise requested of him to employ, as his principal counsellors, Don Christopher de Moura, marquis of Castel Rodrigo, and Don John Idiaquez; from whose experience, fidelity, and great abilities, he might derive the highest advantages, especially in the beginning of his reign *.

† The author of "Addiciones à la Historia del Marques Virgilio Malvezzi," gives the following singular instance of the truth of this assertion. Philip II. intending that his son should marry one of the daughters of Charles, archduke of Austria, and having sent for the pictures of these princesses, he one day, in presence of his daughter Isabella and several of his ministers, desired the young prince to examine the pictures, and make his choice of the princess, whom he would prefer for his wife. Philip, with his usual deference and humility, submitted his choice to the king. The king remonstrated with him on the impropriety of requesting any other person to judge for him, in this matter, in which his own taste alone ought to be consulted, and desired him to carry the pictures to his own apartment, where he might carefully examine them and fix his choice. I have no choice, replied the prince, but your majesty's pleasure, and I am certain that that princess will appear to me the best and the most beautiful whom your majesty shall prefer. p. 137.

city; and prompted by his indolence, he no sooner mounted the throne, than, disregarding the counsels which had been given him, he resolved to avoid the perplexity which might attend his having recourse, on any occasion, to different counsellors, and therefore committed the whole administration of affairs to his favorite the marquis of Denia.

The marquis del Castel Rodrigo, in whom Philip II. had long reposed the most perfect confidence, was honorably dismissed from court, and appointed viceroy of Portugal *. Idiaquez had the presidency of the military orders conferred upon him; and being of a less ambitious, and more complying temper than Castel Rodrigo, and willing to act in an inferior or subordinate capacity, he was suffered to remain, and occasionally consulted, on account of his long experience and the high character which he held for prudence and sagacity †. But all power was lodged in the hands of the favorite, who, having been chief equerry to the king, before his accession to the throne, and having in that station had frequent access to his person, had gained his affections, and acquired an entire ascendant over him.

DUKE
LERMA

He was instantly created duke of Lerma, and admitted into the council of state: after which, the king transmitted edicts to all the councils in the kingdom, requiring obedience to whatever orders should be communicated to them in his name by the duke ‡.

* Davila, p. 36.

† Ibid. p. 37.

‡ Ibid. p. 41.

This determined partiality, which Philip was at no pains to conceal, occasioned a general discontent. The grandees of the first rank were filled with indignation, when they beheld one whom they had been accustomed to regard as their inferior, invested with such unlimited authority; and all ranks of men, judging from former instances of the same nature, dreaded an unprosperous and unquiet reign. Their complaints were the louder and the more generally diffused, as the duke of Lerma was utterly unpractised in the affairs of government, and had not yet given any proof of merit or abilities. It was a demonstration, they thought, of extreme weakness in the character of the king, so avowedly, and in contradiction to the advice and example of his father, whose memory they revered, to declare his choice of a favorite; and they apprehended that, on trial, the character of this favorite would be found, in this respect, too nearly similar to his own⁹. Their apprehensions were not without foundation. By his courtesousness and affability, the duke imposed on the penetration of many of those who approached him; and, by discovering on all occasions the most devoted attachment to the church, he conciliated the favor of the ecclesiastics, but it soon appeared that his views and abilities were extremely limited; and that he neither possessed the economy, the firmness, or the capacity requisite for the difficult and important charge with which he was intrusted¹⁰.

BOOK It was peculiarly unfortunate for the Spanish
I. monarchy to have the helm of government com-1598. mitted to such weak hands at the present period. The late king indeed had foreseen, and, in some measure, provided for this event, by the peace which he had concluded with France, and the resignation of his sovereignty in the Netherlands; which he hoped would put an end to the war in that country, and prove the means of recovering the revolted provinces. He had likewise left all his other dominions, not only in Spain, but in Italy, and in the new world, in the enjoyment of peace; and Portugal, now accustomed to the yoke, yielded a ready obedience to his authority.

But although Philip II. through the vigilance and vigor of his administration, had left his dominions every where, except the Netherlands, in the enjoyment of internal tranquillity, he had not left them in a flourishing condition. On the contrary, Spain, his place of residence, and his seat of empire, was greatly exhausted, and some of the principal sources of her opulence and prosperity were dried up.

By the war in which he had made so many great exertions, both by sea and land, and, still more, perhaps, by the migration of the people to the new world, the inhabitants of Spain were greatly reduced in number. All emoluments and honors which the sovereign could bestow, had, for ages past, been divided between the military and the ecclesiastical professions. By this means, the mechanic arts and agriculture, having come to be regarded as comparatively mean and despicable, were alike abandoned by the indolent or inactive, and by those who were endued with a spirit of ambition and enterprise. This contempt, and the consequent neglect of the more useful arts, the profits arising from which, though sure, are always moderate, was heightened by the frequent instances of enormous fortunes, suddenly acquired by the adventurers in America. That proportion of the riches arising from the American mines, which the sovereign received, was spent either in those countries in which his wars were carried on, or in purchasing naval and military stores from other nations. The greater part of what was imported by merchants and other individuals was laid out in England, Italy, and the Netherlands, for manufactures, which the colonies required, but which Spain was become unable to supply; and the remainder was drained off by taxes which the king had, from time to time, been necessitated to impose. From this scarcity of money; from the want of manufactures; from the neglect of agriculture, joined to the numberless losses sustained at sea, where Philip had been almost always foiled by his enemies, trade of every kind was reduced to the lowest ebb; and so great was the consequent disorder in the finances, that, besides a debt of 140 millions of ducats which he left upon the crown, he had been obliged to have recourse to the disgraceful expedient of employing ecclesiastics to go from house to house, to receive from his subjects in.

B O O K Spain such assistance, as they were willing to afford; a measure which was not attended with the advantage which he had expected to derive from it, while it contributed to sink his reputation in Spain, as his refusal to pay the interest of his foreign debt, before related, had already done in the rest of Europe".

The danger to which the Spanish monarchy was exposed, from that debility to which it was reduced at the present period, was the more to be dreaded, because many parts of this widely extended empire were removed to so great a distance from the seat of government; and nothing, there was ground to believe, could avert the impending ruin, but a vigorous exertion of the highest abilities, joined to the most rigid and judicious economy. It was likewise obviously necessary that peace should instantly have been established with the maritime powers; who, having for several years past, held the sovereignty of the seas, seemed to possess sufficient naval force entirely to destroy the Spanish trade, and to cut off all communication between the mother country and her colonies.

But the duke of Lerma was equally incapable of discerning this danger, and of providing against it. As he had seen the difficulties in which the late king was involved, through the disorder of his finances, and could not be ignorant of the exhausted condition of the kingdom, it might have been expected, that one of the first objects of his attention would have been to retrench the unnecessary expenses of the court, by attempting, if practicable, to reduce the number of superfluous offices, to which, in times of greater prosperity, the vanity of former kings had given birth. But instead of this, he greatly multiplied such sort of offices ¹²; and, in the very infancy of his administration, gave other signal proofs of the degree of profusion which would have been unjustifiable, had the kingdom been in the most flourishing condition.

One of the first events of this reign was the marriage of the king with Margaret of Austria ¹³, whom the archduke Albert had conducted into Spain. He had gone, for this purpose, from the Netherlands to Germany, about the time of the late king's death; and had soon afterwards set out with her from Gratz, by the way of Italy: but so great were the preparations made for her reception in Spain, and, agreeably to the character of the nation, so slowly were they carried on, that the fleet sent to bring her thither did not arrive at Genoa till several months after. In the marriage solemnity, in the city of Valencia, above a million of ducats were expended, besides a great number of rich presents, which were made to foreign princes and to the church ¹⁴. By the ecclesiastics, who on this, as on many other occasions, shared amply of the duke of Lerma's munificence, his conduct was extolled as highly

April. 1599. About the same time with the royal nuptials, those of the archduke with the infanta were solemnized ¹⁶; but not long after, they set out together for the Netherlands, having received full assurance from the king and his minister, that no assistance in money or in troops, which Spain could afford, should be wanting to support them in their new sovereignty, and to enable them to accomplish the reduction of the revolted provinces.

End of May.

In forming this resolution, there was no room for hesitation. From the conditions upon which the late king had transferred the sovereignty of the Netherlands to his daughter, joined to the age of that princess, there was little ground to doubt that it would ere long revert to the Spanish monarchy. It could not be considered, even during the life of the infanta, in any other light, but as a fief of Spain: for she and her successors were expressly required to take an oath of fidelity to the kings of Spain, and, in order to insure the faithful observance of this oath, the liberty was reserved of putting garrisons of Spanish troops into Antwerp, Ghent, Cambray, and other places;

It would probably have saved the Spanish monarchy from the extreme debility into which it fell in the present and in the following reign, and would have highly contributed to lessen those difficulties which, in his future administration, the duke of Lerma was about to encounter, had the sovereignty yielded been enjoyed, free and independent, by the infanta, and Spain been delivered from the burden of the war with the United Provinces. But Isabella could not, in this case, have accepted of the sovereignty conferred on her. Without the assistance of Spain, she must have sunk under her unequal contest with the Dutch, supported by the queen of England; or she must instantly have made peace with these powers, on whatever terms they should be pleased to prescribe. The sovereignty of the United Provinces would thus have been established, and both their religious and civil liberty have been recognised.

To embrace a measure which would be attended with so disagreeable a consequence, Philip was hardly less averse than his father had ever been. With a temper gentle and obsequious to excess, he was devoted with the most bigoted attachment to the popish faith; and being entirely governed by his minister, who, on all occasions, assiduously courted the favor of the Spanish ecclesiastics, and ¹⁷ Thuanus, lib. cxxi. cap. 2.

B O O K the sovereign pontiff, he would have believed
 I. himself highly criminal in the sight of God, had reduce the revolted provinces under obedience to the holy see. He had besides, before his father's death, formally given his consent to the deed of transference, with all the conditions that were an-nexed to it; and, as he could not, consistently with honor, so, from his affection to the infanta,

 he was not, inclined to retract.

Prompted by these motives, which were not likely ever to lose their force, he resolved to consider his sister's and her husband's interest as his own, and to take the same concern in all the affairs of the Netherlands, as if the sovereignty of that country had never been transferred. Conformably to this resolution, both the money and the troops of Spain continued to be employed in the Low Countries, as in the preceding reign. All the affairs of these provinces were directed as formerly by Spanish councils. The interest of the Spanish monarch was affected as much as ever by what happened there; and, for these reasons, almost all the important transactions which passed in the provinces, for several years after the present period, make an essential part of the Spanish history.

The archduke having, during his absence, committed the government of the Netherlands to his cousin, cardinal Andrew of Austria, bishop of Constance, and the command of the forces to Mendoza, marquis of Gaudalette, and admiral of Arragon, had instructed the latter to secure some convenient passage over the Rhine, which might open an entrance into the northern provinces, and enable him either to support the army at the expense of the enemy, or, if that should be found impracticable, to quarter them in the country of Cleves, and the other neutral adjoining states. Albert gave Mendoza instructions, at the same time, to avoid exposing the army to any unnecessary risk, before his return; and therefore there is little room for doubt that his principal intention, in ordering him to cross the Rhine, was to furnish the troops with free quarters, in compensation for their pay. To form this extraordinary resolution, it is said, he was determined by necessity; the southern provinces of the Netherlands having been greatly exhausted by the depredations of the Spanish troops, which had so often mutinied, and his exchequer drained, partly by the sums lately advanced in payment of their arrears, and partly by the preparations for his journey to Spain, which, in honor of the young queen, had been performed with unusual magnificence ¹¹.

But whatever were Albert's motives for having recourse to so unjustifiable an expedient, it should seem that he could not have made choice of a person better qualified by the native temper of his mind for carrying his plan into execution. Immediately after the archduke's departure, Mendoza, having collected together all the

B O O K troops which could be spared from the necessary
 I. defence of the country, passed over the Maese 1599. near Ruremonde, and directed his march, at the head of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse ¹⁹ towards Orfoy, a town on the west side of the Rhine, belonging to the dutchy of Cleves. The garrison of this place, being utterly unprepared for defence, were easily induced by promises mingled with threats, to open their gates and receive him. He then applied himself to strengthen the fortifications of the town and citadel, and at the same time employed a great part of his forces for several weeks in fortifying Wassum, a small town on the east side of the river, directly opposite to Orfoy.

Although his communication with the country beyond the Rhine was thus secured, he judged it to be of great importance to get possession of some other town upon the Rhine, at a smaller distance from the enemy, and therefore he marched down the river, with all his forces, and laid siege to Rhinberg. This place, belonging to the bishopric of Cologne, was, as above related, in the hands of the United Provinces. It was deemed a place of considerable strength, and was defended by a sufficient garrison. The Spaniards, after battering the walls, attempted to take the town
 by storm, and were repulsed with great slaughter.

¹⁹ This army consisted of seven thousand Spaniards, three thousand Italians, two thousand Burgundians, a thousand Irish, and seven thousand Germans and Walloons, besides the cavalry.

But the siege was much sooner brought to a conclusion than the besiegers had reason to expect, through one of those fatal accidents which have often happened since the invention of gun-powder, when the utmost precaution is not employed in preserving it. Having caught fire, from a spark occasioned by the stroke of a cannon-ball against the tower where the magazine was kept, and which the ball had entered by a window, not only the tower, but a great part of the wall of the town was thrown down. Several vessels in the river were, by the violent agitation of the water, overwhelmed and sunk, and the governor, his wife and family, with a considerable number of the inhabitants, were buried in the ruins. The garrison stood aghast at this unforeseen disaster; and, dreading that the town must now be taken by assault, they resolved, without further resistance, to capitulate on terms, to which Mendoza, in order to save time, immediately agreed²⁰.

By the success which had attended the Spanish arms in the reduction of Orsoy and Rhinberg, all the other towns in that quarter were filled with anxiety and terror. Burick, a town on the west-side of the Rhine, in the dutchy of Cleves, having, without hesitation, admitted a Spanish garrison, Mendoza began to make preparations for employing force against Wesel, one of the most flourishing places in the circle of Westphalia, and which had lately received a considerable 1599. exercise of the Catholic religion, and established the Reformed, as taught by Calvin, in its stead, they knew how guilty they must appear in the eyes of a Spaniard, and were at the same time conscious of being unable to defend themselves against so great a force. They attempted, by sending the general an embassy with presents for himself, to divert him from his purpose. But Mendoza, laying hold of this opportunity to color his present expedition with the pretext of zeal for the popish faith, peremptorily required they should immediately restore the exercise of the Catholic religion. With this condition the inhabitants, in order to avoid a siege, were obliged, though extremely reluctant, to comply²¹. After which, though he had before rejected their presents, he demanded a large supply of provisions, and of money for his troops; and having obtained his demands, he continued his march down the river, and took possession of the towns of Rees and Emmerick.

The inhabitants of the latter of these places, having been long distinguished by their attachment to popery, had, from some interested motive, invited the Spanish army to come into that quarter, and had received a promise in writing from Mendoza, that neither their town nor territory should suffer any inconvenience from the neighbourhood of his troops. He insisted however upon their admitting a Spanish garrison; and when they reminded him of his promise, by one of their principal ecclesiastics, he replied, that the service of the king and the interest of religion made it necessary for him to change his views and measures. The priest asked him if, after such a declaration, it was surprising that the revolted provinces should refuse to put trust in the faith of the king of Spain, or of his generals; and warned him of the vengeance threatened by heaven against deceit and falsehood. But Mendoza, unmoved by this remonstrance, gave orders for the immediate admission of his troops ²². In order, however, to appease the people of Emmerick, he readily promised that only four hundred should be sent, and he even required the German officer who commanded them to swear that he would not admit a greater number. Notwithstanding which, so little regard did he pay either to his character or his faith, that he afterwards attempted to introduce another cohort, under Barlotta, an Italian; to whom the German refused admittance, saying openly, that though the general had set the example, he would not violate his faith.

After getting possession of Emmerick, the Spanish army was at the distance only of a few miles from the fort of Schenck, and other places belonging to the United Provinces; nor had the states been inattentive to the danger which so nearly threatened them. Having, from the commencement of Mendoza's expedition, suspected that his design must be to make an attack upon their eastern frontier, prince Maurice had hastily assembled together at Arnheim a body of troops, amounting to six thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, and had ventured to cross the Iffel, and advanced towards the enemy as far as Zevenaer, which lies at little more than a day's march from Emmerick.

With such unequal forces he could not pretend to cope with the enemy in the open field; but on no occasion had he ever exhibited greater military skill and conduct. By making choice of the most proper stations, which the nature of the country could afford, and the prudence and vigilance which he displayed in strengthening all the approaches to his camp, he rendered it impossible for the Spanish general to attack him with any probability of success; while, at the same time, he prevented him from advancing any farther, or undertaking the siege of any of the frontier towns upon the Iffel. The two armies, between which there was so great a disparity of numbers, lay for a considerable time almost in sight of each other; and, from the anxiety which Mendoza discovered on that occasion, it should seem he was deeply impressed with a sense of his inferiority to prince Maurice, in respect of military knowledge and capacity. For ten days and nights, without intermission, his whole army, horse and foot, stood under their arms; and were permitted to take no other rest, though it was the middle of winter, but in their ranks in the open air. It was necessary, mean while, to send out his cavalry, and the retainers of his camp, in search of forage and provisions; and between them and detachments of the prince's army various rencounters happened, in which they were always worsted, and considerable numbers taken prisoners.

B O O K
I.

Both the Spanish infantry and cavalry had begun to suffer so much from the cold, joined to a scarcity of provisions, and were at the same time so much disheartened by that anxiety and dread of which their general's conduct was so expressive, that there was ground to believe, that if Maurice had thought himself at liberty to attack them, he would have acquired a cheap and easy victory.

Finding it at length impossible, on account of the want of provisions, to remain any longer in their present situation, they directed their march towards Duyssburgh, which commands an important passage over the Iffel, into the territory of Veluwe. But Maurice, who lay nearer to that place, easily reached it in time to be fully prepared for their approach. They stopt short therefore at Dotechem, a town on their road to Duyssburgh; and there deliberated what course they should next pursue.

November.

To a general of such mean capacity as Mendoza, and so little endued with the spirit of laudable ambition or enterprize, there appeared to be no room for hesitation. By the severity of the season, by the sword of the enemy, and by desertion, his army had suffered considerable diminution;

B O O K

I.

and, having been long permitted to plunder the country through which they passed, and to live in the most licentious manner, they were become reluctant to submit to the control of military discipline. He dreaded, besides, the great abilities of Maurice, and thought it doubtful whether, in case he should succeed in effecting his passage over the Iffel, he would find it practicable to support his army during the winter-season in the territories of the states, where almost all the towns were fortified, and prepared for their defence. Determined by these considerations, he resolved to turn back, and to take up his winter quarters in the dutchy of Cleves, and other neutral states in the territory of Westphalia. He accordingly retired with precipitation, leaving behind him many of his sick and wounded, exposed to the mercy of the inhabitants of the country, who were highly exasperated by the injury and outrage they had received. Maurice pursued him for several miles, and cut off or took prisoners so great a number of his troops, that, including those who had deserted, and those who had fallen or were taken prisoners in former rencounters, it was computed that he had lost above seven thousand men.

Bad conduct of Mendoza.

He fixed his head-quarters at Rees, having left a strong garrison in Emmerick, which lay nearer to the enemy, under the command of the count de Boucquoy, one of his ablest officers. But the count, having soon after been taken prisoner in a skirmish with count Lewis of Nassau, Maurice conceived the design of making himself master of the town. For this purpose he ordered count Hohenloe to invest it; and, in order to prevent Mendoza from returning to its relief, he cut the dike of the Rhine, and laid all the country between Rees and Emmerick under water. By this device the garrison, having no prospect of assistance from their friends, were intimidated, and, after a feeble resistance, laid down their arms. Maurice was equally successful against the garrison of Zevenaer: but being well pleased with an opportunity of showing his condemnation of the conduct of the Spanish general, who, with so great a contempt of the established laws of nations, had seized on the towns of neutral powers, he retained possession of neither of these places, but delivered Emmerick to the citizens, and Zevenaer to the duke of Cleves²³. After which he put his troops into winter-quarters, and went himself to the Hague, where he was employed during the remaining part of the winter in making preparations for the next campaign.

Magnanimous policy of Maurice.

In the mean time Mendoza, equally inattentive to his character and to the laws of humanity, permitted his troops to exercise the most cruel oppression over the people of Westphalia, from whom he could not pretend that either the king of Spain or the archduke had received the smallest injury. After plundering the inhabitants of the open country, and leaving them neither corn nor cattle for their support, he allowed his soldiers to employ force against such of the towns indulged themselves in every species of licentious-ness; and treated the inhabitants, on innumerable occasions, with a degree of barbarous cruelty and outrage, of which the troops under Frederic de Toledo had, in their treatment of the people of Zutphen and Naarden, furnished the only instance which occurs in the annals of Europe for many years ²².

Their barbarity.

In order to compel such of the people as they suspected of being rich, to reveal their treasures,
 they wounded some, they mutilated others, and,
 under the pretext of their being heretics, they committed others to the flames. Count Falcostein, lord of Bruck, a Protestant, having refused them admittance into his castle, which for some time he defended against them with great resolution, at length surrendered on condition that he and his domestics should be allowed to depart in safety;
 but he was no sooner in their power, than they first butchered his domestics before his eyes, and afterwards himself. Mendoza had the effrontery to avow and vindicate some instances of this kind,

by alledging, that those who had suffered were heretics; but it was not the Protestants only, but great numbers likewise of the Catholics, who experienced the barbarity of his troops; and even many of those who had distinguished themselves by their attachment to the Spanish interest in the Netherlands; among whom were the subjects of the bishops of Munster, Paderborn, Liege, and Cologne, as well as the dutchies of Cleves and Juliers, who were all treated with the same violence and inhumanity²⁵.

By these enormities the German princes were affected in the manner which it was natural to expect. They were fired with indignation against their barbarous oppressors, and had early deliberated concerning the measures proper to be pursued. No European nation had been more distinguished than the Germans by their warlike disposition, and their military prowess, as no nation had exerted greater intrepidity and vigor in the defence of their property and liberty when attacked. But, having enjoyed profound tranquillity for near half a century, and all of them, but a few who had entered into the service of foreign states, having been disused to war, their tameness and timidity invited the injuries of the Spanish foldiers; who found not only the inhabitants of the open country, but those likewise of most of the towns, utterly defenceless and unarmed. It was probably Albert's knowledge of this, joined to the consideration of the character of Rodolph, the present emperor, a prince of a tame and indolent disposition, that had induced him to resolve to support his army at the expense of the Germans; and what they suffered affords a striking proof how necessary it is that every people, exposed by their situation to be invaded, should, instead of trusting to their neutrality, or to the faith of treaties, stand, on all occasions, in a posture of defence.

The people who suffered most from the depredations of the Spaniards were the subjects of the duke of Cleves, and of Ernest of Bavaria, who held, at the present period, the four bishoprics of Munster, Paderborn, Liege, and Cologne. Ernest, who had formerly been much indebted to the court of Spain, and was extremely desirous of avoiding a rupture with the archduke, in order to obtain redress, resolved to content himself with making remonstrances and complaints.

Confederacy of German princes against Mendoza.

The duke of Cleves was a weak prince, and, being at times disordered in his judgment, was incapable of holding the reins of government. But his place was well supplied, on the present occasion, by his sister, Sibylla, a princess of a masculine spirit, who exerted great activity in rousing the indignation of the neighbouring states and princes, and labored to convince them of the necessity of uniting together, in order to drive the Spaniards out of Germany. The elector Palatine, the landgrave of Hesse, several imperial cities on the banks of the Rhine, and a great number of counts, and other sovereign princes in Westphalia, readily entered into Sibylla's views, and endeavoured to interest the rest of the empire, or at least the neighbouring circles, in their cause.

They began with remonstrating to the archduke against the iniquity of his conduct; and they were seconded by an ambassador, sent for that purpose by the emperor, who likewise published a rescript, commanding Mendoza immediately to evacuate the towns and territories of which he had taken possession. But, finding that no regard was paid by Mendoza to the emperor's rescript; and that, instead of complying with their requests, Albert only lamented that the necessity of his situation had obliged him to adopt a measure which he said was equally disagreeable to himself as to them, they assembled together at Munster, and resolved all of them, but the bishop, or elector of Cologne, to have recourse to arms. It was agreed that a numerous army should be raised with the utmost expedition. The proportion of money and troops which each prince or state should furnish was ascertained; and the count de La Lippe, lieutenant general of the circle of Westphalia, was appointed to be commander in chief. From the unanimity, alacrity, and ardor which appeared in this assembly, there was ground to hope for the utmost dispatch and vigor in carrying the plan adopted into execution; yet from the slowness incident to the motions of a league, in which no one member possesses authority sufficient to control the rest, the season, as will be seen in the 1599. The Spanish army, in the mean time, kept possession of all the towns into which they had entered; and, without restraint from their general, continued to exercise over the people the same oppression as before; till the season arrived when the cardinal governor of the Netherlands judged it proper to begin the operations of a new campaign. They were then withdrawn from all the towns in which they were quartered, except Orsoy, Rhinberg, Rees, and Emmerick; the last of which places they had again obliged the inhabitants to surrender, after prince Maurice had retired.

 Bommel.

The cardinal, having come to Rees, where he held a council of war, to deliberate concerning an expedition against some of the frontier-towns of the United Provinces, it was determined to undertake the siege of Bommel, the conquest of which would open an entrance into Holland: but, in order to conceal this intention from the states, and to facilitate the landing of the troops on the isle of Bommel, it was agreed to send a detachment of the army to make a feigned attack on the fort of Schenck, which, as formerly described, is situated on the upper extremity of the Betuwe. This detachment was sent down along the right or north side of the Rhine, while Mendoza, with the main army, marched down on the other; and both divisions began about the same time to play off their batteries against the fort; the former from the banks of the Rhine, and the latter from those of the Waal.

Prince Maurice's head - quarters were at Arnheim, only a few leagues distant from Schenck. He had never before experienced so great anxiety or fatigue. Almost all the officers, on whom he chiefly depended for the execution of his orders, were absent: count Hohenloe was in Germany, employed in exciting the princes of the league of Munster to take the field against the Spaniards; colonel Vere was not returned from England, whither he had gone to hasten a body of fresh troops, which had been promised by Elizabeth; and the younger la Noue had not finished some levies which, with the connivance of the king, he had been making among the Protestants in France. All the troops therefore which Maurice had been able to muster, after leaving sufficient garrisons in the fortified towns, amounted only at this time to four thousand men. With this little army he crossed over to the Betuwe; and having reinforced the garrison of Schenck, and strengthened the banks opposite to Mendoza, where only he had occasion to suspect that an attack might be designed, he lay prepared to oppose him in case he should attempt to land on the island.

The Spaniards, having the river between them and the fort, were at too great a distance to do execution with their attillery; and, as this attack was only a feint to amuse prince Maurice, for

B O O K this reason they had not taken time to employ
 1. the usual precautions for their shelter from the 1599. enemy's fire, they lost upward of four hundred men. This expence of blood, which the prince could easily observe from the ramparts, contributed to confirm his belief that their design against the fort was serious, and his attention was therefore wholly engrossed with providing for its defence. In the mean time the count of Berg, with a body of troops, under the command of the colonels Stanley, Zapeau, and Barlotta, was ordered to march down along the left or south side of the Waal; and, in order to cover his intention, a great number of boats had been transported to this river over land from the Maese, on board of which he embarked his troops, and seemed to intend passing over to the Betuwe.
 Prince Maurice could hardly doubt that this was his design; and, to prevent him from accomplishing it, he carefully watched his motions with a part of his forces, which being put on board of boats collected together at Nimeguen, kept directly opposite to the Spaniards in their progress down the river. In this manner both parties continued to advance, sometimes approaching within reach of each other's fire, and the Spaniards seemingly intending on some occasions to effect a landing on the Betuwe, till they both arrived in the neighbourhood of the Voorn; when the count de Berg, having disembarked his troops, drew all his boats
 on shore, and having put them into carriages which had been prepared for that purpose, he marched with great expedition across the country, from the Waal to the Maese, where having again launched his boats, he sailed down the river till he arrived at Empel, and thus secured a passage into the isle of Bommel.

The fortifications of the town of that name, which stands on the other side of the island, though, on account of its situation, deemed a place of great importance, had, amidst the multiplicity of objects which required the attention of Maurice and the states, been extremely neglected; the old fortifications were ruinous, and new ones, which had been begun, were yet unfinished.

Had the troops therefore under the count de Berg been sufficiently numerous, or had Mendoza advanced in time to his support, he might without much difficulty have accomplished the object of his expedition. But the army having been detained longer than it ought to have been in the fictitious attack on the fort of Schenck, the count was obliged to rest satisfied with securing his station at Empel, or with making short excursions into the country. Prince Maurice was, in the mean time, every day receiving fresh supplies of troops from France, England, and other places; and his army amounted now to so great a number, that he could afford to leave a part of it for the defence of the Betuwe, and lead the rest to Bommel.

He accordingly no sooner received information of the count of Berg's invasion of that island than he set out with the greater part of his army, and

B O O K arrived there in time to prevent the inhabitants
 1. from abandoning the town, which they were pre-1559. paring to do, from their despair of being able to defend it. Mendoza left his camp opposite to the Schenck about the same time, and, having in his march reduced the fort of Crevecœur, which would have interrupted his communication with Bois le Duc, he transported his forces into the isle of Bommel, and began to lead them towards the town. He first attempted to make himself master of the dike of Waal, on which he intended to have erected batteries, in order to straiten the navigation of the river, but was prevented by an incessant fire from a great number of armed vessels, which Maurice had prepared for that purpose. From the delay occasioned by this unnecessary enterprise, and the reduction of Cre-vecœur, a general of so great activity as Maurice had leisure to put the town of Bommel into a proper posture of defence.

His army, at this time, was not inferior to that of the enemy, and amounted to eighteen thousand foot and three thousand horse. Having pitched his camp on the right side of the Waal, opposite to Bommel, and constructed two bridges ²⁷, formed of barks covered with planks, one above and the other below the town, he committed the defence of the place to a select body of four thousand foot and two thousand horse.

Bommel was too small a place to admit of so numerous a garrison; but, in order that he might avail himself of the great number of his troops, his first care had been to give the town an artificial magnitude, by drawing round it at a little distance from the walls, an intrenchment, strengthened with a ditch, and with redoubts at proper distances; to which he added a covered way; a new species of fortification, of which he himself was the inventor, and which he first put in practice on the present occasion.

Maurice invents a new species of fortification.

Mendoza was greatly disconcerted by the celerity and dispatch with which these works were executed: and as not only the cannon planted upon them, but a strong battery which Maurice had raised on the dike of the river, was ready to be played off upon the Spaniards, as soon as they approached, they suffered a considerable loss of men, before they could cover themselves with their trenches. Mendoza might now have seen his error in not advancing sooner to the siege: and, if he reflected on the strength of the place, and the number of the garrison, or on the neighbourhood of the prince's army, and the facility with which, as he was master of the river, he could, at all times, introduce supplies, or reinforcements into the town, it must appear surprising that he did not perceive the impossibility of succeeding in his attempt.

Prince Maurice, on the other hand, was blamed by many of his countrymen for resting satisfied with defending a town against an enemy, whom it was alledged, as he was superior to them in numbers, he might have successfully encountered in the open field. It began to be surmised that Maurice did not wish to bring the war to a conclusion; and the states sent deputies, to represent to him, that, as they could never expect to assemble a more flourishing army than was at present under his command, and the expense which their late preparations had cost them was enormous²², they could not help expressing their desire that he would shorten the campaign as much as possible, and must therefore recommend to him, if he could do it with safety, to try the fortune of a general engagement.

Maurice was the more surprised at this remonstrance of the states, as they had hitherto been extremely averse to all adventurous measures; and, on many occasions, had discovered a degree of caution bordering on timidity. He could not account for it, but on the supposition that they had listened to the insinuations of his enemies, who accused him of protracting the war, with the view of perpetuating his own authority: and, in order to wipe off this groundless aspersions, he would not have declined the risk of a battle, in case a favorable opportunity had offered. "But, in the present situation of the Spanish army, in a country so narrow and confined, where his cavalry, in which only he was superior, could be of little use, no such opportunity could reasonably be expected. Should he attempt to transport his army over the Maese into Brabant, Bommel must thereby fall into the hands of the Spaniards; and, although, after the reduction of that place, they should be induced to follow him, and to offer battle, yet, without the greatest probability of success, he should doubt whether it would be expedient to accept; as the fate of battles often depended on accidents, which no human prudence could foresee; and the king of Spain, with such inexhaustible resources, could much more easily sustain the loss of an army than the states. It was for these reasons, not only his opinion, but that of his most experienced officers, that the enemy should be permitted to spend their strength in the siege of Bommel, which, should they persist in it, he was confident would prove their ruin." The states, convinced by these considerations, entered without much difficulty into the prince's views, and left him at liberty to pursue the plan of operations which he had laid before them. The cardinal Andrew, in the mean time, having with great activity formed at Bois le Duc, the most ample magazines of every thing necessary for the siege, Mendoza was enabled to make his approaches to the town, with greater expedition than there was reason to expect. His troops were now, in a good measure, covered from the enemy's fire; and he had begun to play off his batteries. But it soon appeared how little reason he had to flatter himself with the hopes of success in his enterprise. The garrison, supported by fresh troops, sent to their assistance by the prince, could not only prevent them from making farther progress

The Spanish troops displayed, on every occasion, the most determined intrepidity; and thereby fully justified the caution of prince Maurice, in declining to reduce them to the necessity of a general engagement. They gave the most striking proofs likewise of the excellence of their military discipline, by recovering themselves with a facility which astonished the enemy, from the confusion into which they were sometimes thrown; and they were every where successful in repressing the sallies of the garrison, although these sallies were performed by numerous bodies, amounting to five or six thousand men, of the best of the French and English forces, conducted by la Noue, colonel Vere, and other officers of the most unquestionable bravery. They suffered, however, considerable loss. In the space of three weeks, upwards of two thousand perished; and the cardinal governor, being at last convinced of the absurdity of persisting in his enterprise, sent orders to Mendoza to raise the siege.

lonna.

He was determined, however, by the advice of Colonna, the historian, who was, at this time, an officer in the Spanish army, to attempt accomplishing, in another way, the object of the present expedition, by erecting a fort in another part of the island, from which the same advantage might be derived as from the possession of Bommel:

and, for this purpose, agreeably to the counsel that was given him, he made choice of a narrow neck of land which unites the upper with the lower part of the island, intending to occupy, with a fortification of the strongest kind, the whole space between the Maese and the Waal; and thus, not only to facilitate an invasion of the United Provinces, but to check the enemy's navigation in both rivers.

The construction of this fort was committed to Velasco, general of the artillery. A thousand soldiers, and two thousand pioneers, were employed in the work; and the army was posted about the neighbouring villages of Herwyn and Rossem, to prevent the approach of the enemy.

Beginning
of June.

Maurice having penetrated this design, led up his troops along the north side of the Waal, and took his station directly opposite to the Spaniards; where, having planted batteries of his largest cannon, he greatly annoyed the workmen, and, though not without some loss, did considerable execution. Velasco, however, persevered, and was at length able to cover his men from the enemy's fire.

The prince finding then that all his efforts in this quarter must be ineffectual, transported his army into the adjoining isle of Voorn; and, from thence, sent over a detachment of three thousand men, to the upper part of the isle of Bommel; giving them instructions to intrench themselves at the village of Hervorden, which lies at a little distance from the place where the Spaniards were

BOOK employed in making the new fort. His orders
 1. were executed with the greatest expedition, and 1599. the intrenchments almost completed before the Spaniards got notice that the troops had landed on the island.

Mendoza, sensible of the danger and inconveniencies to which he was exposed, from having the enemy so near him, immediately dispatched the count de Berg, to attack their lines, with a numerous body of chosen troops. The count was repulsed with the loss of more than five hundred men, among whom were many officers of distinguished merit: but having stationed the greater part of his army on that side of the fort which lay next to the enemy, he kept the prince at bay, and enabled Velasco, without interruption, to carry on his operations in the construction of the fort.

The Spanish cavalry, in the mean time, which could neither have proper accommodation, nor be supplied with forage in the isle of Bommel, were quartered in Brabant, in the neighbourhood of Megen. Their communication with the main army was kept open by a bridge over the Maese; but as they lay at the distance of several miles, a fort, called Durango, from the name of the engineer employed in constructing it, and several redoubts, had been erected on that part of the dike of the river by which the enemy might approach. Notwithstanding these prudent precautions, prince Maurice still resolved to attack the Spanish cavalry, and, with this view, having thrown a bridge over the Maese from the isle of Voorn, he kept his own cavalry in readiness to march as soon as orders should be given them. But judging it necessary before-hand to dislodge the Spaniards from their fortifications on the dike of the river, he sent the sieur de la Noue, and colonel Vere, with a select body of troops, chiefly English and French, to make an attack on fort Durango. Nothing could surpass the spirit and intrepidity which these troops, animated by the example of their leaders, displayed in the attack. Having thrown down their pikes and muskets, they scaled the ramparts in several places, and attacked the garrison, with extraordinary fury, sword in hand. But this garrison, consisting of Spaniards and Walloons, though amounting only to five hundred men, commanded by Ladeiano, an officer of distinguished bravery, in their defence discovered a degree of intrepidity not inferior to that of the assailants. The smallness of their number was compensated by the advantages of their situation; and the combat was thus prolonged for several hours, with mutual slaughter, till la Noue and Vere, being informed that Mendoza was approaching towards them with superior forces, judged it prudent to retire.

July.

No other memorable transactions happened between the contending parties during this campaign. Maurice could not venture now to attack the Spanish cavalry with safety; and, from the precautions which had been taken to cover the workmen employed in erecting the fort in Bommel, joined to the advantageous situation of the Spanish army, he found it impossible to prevent them from carrying that design into execution.

The fort was accordingly finished in the most regular manner: the ramparts, flanked with bastions, and instantly planted with cannon, in a great measure commanded the navigation of the Maese, on the south, and of the Waal, on the north. On the east and west, they were secured with ditches of extraordinary breadth and depth, which being at all times filled with water from the rivers, served as harbours for twelve armed vessels, stationed in them to cruise against the enemy. And, in imitation of the example which Maurice had exhibited in the fortifications of Bommel, the whole was strengthened with a covered way, which was strongly fortified with redoubts.

The cardinal came himself to visit this fort as soon as it was finished; and having marked out a place for a church, of which he laid the first stone with his own hand, he gave both to the church, and to the fort, the name of Saint Andrew. He had been extremely desirous to distinguish his administration by some remarkable achievement; and he was overjoyed to have been able to finish so great a work, which he hoped would be found of great importance towards the reduction of the revolted provinces.

Prince Maurice, on the other hand, notwithstanding his successful defence of Bommel, could not fail to be severely mortified; although, as will appear in the sequel, this fort, the erecting of which he had exerted his utmost skill and vigor to prevent, served only to furnish him with one opportunity more than would otherwise have occurred to display his wonted activity and enterprize. In the mean time, he built another fort directly opposite to Saint Andrew, on the right side of the Waal, which rendered the country of Betuwe secure against the excursions of the enemy ²⁹.

During the course of these transactions in the Netherlands, the Germans in the circle of Westphalia had begun their operations against the Spanish garrisons in Rhinberg, and the other towns upon the Rhine. But as neither the emperor, nor the electors of Cologne, Mentz, and Treves, besides several other popish princes, were willing to come to an open rupture with the court of Spain, their preparations for war had not been carried on with that alacrity which might have been expected from the strong and just resentment with which they were inflamed; and the season of action was far spent before they were ready to open the campaign. The elector Palatine had withdrawn his contingent of troops, under the pretext that the league had been violated by the other electors; and the bishop of Cologne, though his subjects had suffered greatly from the depredations of the Spaniards, had carried his complaisance to them to so great a length, as to

 1. and to furnish them with provisions and military 1599. stores. It was therefore with the utmost difficulty that the count de la Lippe could muster twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse ¹⁰, and the greatest part of these were raw troops, entirely unaccustomed to military discipline.

With such an army it is probable that no general could have fulfilled the expectations of those by whom it had been assembled, and the count de la Lippe possessed neither experience nor capacity sufficient to entitle him to the supreme command. The counts Hohenloe and Solmes had been sent to his assistance by the United States; and these men were neither deficient in courage nor in activity and enterprise; but they discovered a jealousy of each other, which proved pernicious to the cause in which they were engaged, and when they differed in their opinions, the general was incapable of determining aright to which of their counsels the preference was due.

The first enterprise in which he was engaged was the siege of Rhinberg; but having no part of the apparatus necessary for carrying it on, except what he received from Holland, and the inhabitants of the adjacent country, whose resentment the governor of the Netherlands had found means to appease, being unwilling to supply his troops with provisions, he soon abandoned his attempt, and directed his march towards Rees, where he expected the Dutch could more easily convey to him such assistance as his exigencies should require.

¹⁰ Grotius.

The garrison of Rees was ill prepared for their defence, and if la Lippe had listened to the counsel of count Hohenloe, who advised him to station a part of his army on the other side of the river, to prevent them from receiving any reinforcement or supplies, they would soon have found it necessary to lay down their arms: but he neglected this necessary precaution. The garrison were several times reinforced by detachments from the army in Bommel; and at length, finding themselves possessed of sufficient strength, and observing that the siege was carried on in the most remiss and negligent manner, they made a vigorous attack upon his trenches, put a great number of his men to the sword, nailed up several of his cannon, and even carried off some of them in triumph to the town.

This disaster increased the division which from the beginning had subsisted among the leaders. The troops were disheartened, and became more disobedient and refractory than ever; and in two days after the count gave orders to raise the siege.

The retreat of this army was still more disgraceful than their conduct during the siege. Dreading that the garrison would renew their attack upon the trenches, they fled in the most precipitate manner, leaving behind them a great part of their baggage and provisions. The Spaniards hung in their rear for several miles, put many to the sword, and threw the whole army into confusion. Not long after, a party of them mutinied against their officers, left their standards, and, in

The Dutch had, in the beginning, entertained the hopes of finding useful allies in the Germans. With this view they had exerted all their influence in rousing them to arms, and had several times supplied them with stores and provisions. On the present occasion they sent William de Nassau, a near relation of prince Maurice, an experienced officer, and a person of distinguished prudence, to attempt to re-establish discipline among the troops, and a good understanding among the leaders, but all his endeavours having proved ineffectual for these ends, and the winter-season approaching, it was judged necessary to disband the army, and put an end to this inglorious campaign.

Such is frequently the fate of confederacies formed by the union of independent princes, even when there is one common interest to unite them, unless the supreme command be devolved on some person of extraordinary abilities, whose want of power may be supplied by the confidence inspired by his superior merit.

Notwithstanding the feeble efforts of this confederacy, the archduke having only intended, by seizing the German towns, to accommodate his troops for a season, ordered most of them to be evacuated. He likewise promised to indemnify the several states for the injuries and damages which they had sustained; and two commissioners were appointed by the emperor to estimate their losses; but it does not appear that any thing effectual was ever done in consequence of this appointment¹¹.

In Spain the duke of Lerma, desirous to give some proof of vigor in the beginning of his administration, fitted out a fleet of fifty ships of war, which he put under the command of Don Martin de Padilla, and sent to cruise against the English; but this enterprise proved equally unfortunate as most of the former ones which the Spaniards had undertaken against their northern enemies. Padilla had not been many days at sea when a violent storm arose, which obliged him, without having seen the English fleet, to return to Spain.

The duke of Lerma was more successful in the measure which at this time he suggested to the king, for conciliating the affections of his subjects in Arragon, who had been disgusted by the treatment which they had received in the former reign. Philip and his young queen, accompanied by the duke and many other courtiers, having set out to visit the city of Saragossa, notice was sent to the inhabitants, by order of the king, that he could not enter their town with pleasure till the heads of those citizens, who had suffered in the unfortunate affair of Antonio Perez, were

This order, so agreeable to the people, and which was instantly obeyed, was accompanied with the royal pardon to all those who had been concerned in the insurrection, and a declaration, that the king could not be happy while any of his faithful subjects had cause of grief. He then made a magnificent entry into the town, amidst the strongest demonstrations of affection and joy on the part of the inhabitants; and soon after he solemnly confirmed all their rights and privileges ³².

Among the entertainments which the people of Saragossa presented to their king on this occasion, there was one, which, at the present period, will appear somewhat extraordinary; a dispute held at the university, at the conferring the degree of doctor, the subject of which was, whether the emperor be the lord or sovereign of the whole world ³³.

During the course of the transactions that have been related, Albert and Isabella arrived in the Netherlands ³⁴. They entered Brussels with a splendid court and retinue, and were received with extraordinary magnificence. There was considerable difficulty in adjusting the form of the oath of allegiance which they administered to their new subjects; and the states of Brabant demanding that, beforehand, certain forts and citadels should be demolished, and the ancient rights and privileges of the provinces ratified; but, finding that the archdukes, (this was the title which Albert and Isabella now assumed) were utterly averse to comply with their requests, they were persuaded to desist from their purpose, and agreed, though with much reluctance, to take the oath required. It was likewise a matter of great offence to the Flemings that Albert, besides assuming the Spanish dress, and requiring to be served upon the knee, had formed his court according to the model of that of Spain, and in every thing adopted the Spanish manners and customs, in preference to those of the Netherlands. This conduct was probably intended to gratify the Spaniards, on whom Albert saw he must principally depend during the continuance of the war; but it contributed to alienate the affections of his Flemish subjects, and to prevent them from exerting themselves with active zeal in his behalf ³⁵.

He stood however much in need, at the present juncture, of all the assistance which they were able to afford. Although he had received a considerable supply from the duke of Lerma, before his departure from Spain, yet having, in conformity to the practice of the age, expended large sums in idle pomp and show in his marriage solemnity, and his magnificent entrance into Brussels, and other towns which he and Isabella visited on their accession, he found himself utterly unable to discharge the arrears due to his troops, who no sooner entered their winter-quarters than they began to mutiny against their officers. The Spanish forces, to the number of two thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, having abandoned their commanders, took possession of the town of Hamont, in the bishopric of Liege, where, having first strengthened the fortifications, they lived at free quarters on the inhabitants, and laid all the adjacent country under contribution. Their example was quickly followed by sixteen hundred Italians, and soon afterwards the garrisons of Crevecœur and St. Andrew, consisting of Germans and Walloons, expelled their officers and elected others from their own number in their room³⁶.

Siege of St.
Andrew.

Prince Maurice, having received information of these disorders, did not suffer so favorable an opportunity of action to escape. After reducing the town of Wachtendonc, and the fort of Crevecœur, and making a successful attack on the Spanish cavalry, in the neighbourhood of Bois le Duc, where he put near five hundred of them to the sword, he laid siege to St. Andrew. This fort, the only fruit of the operations of a whole campaign, the archduke justly considered as a place of the first importance, both on account of the strength of the fortifications, and the great advantage which it afforded him for invading the revolted provinces. He was therefore extremely solicitous to preserve it, and for this purpose assembled together at Bois le Duc such a body of troops as were deemed sufficient to raise the siege. Of these troops he gave the command to Velasco, by whom the fort had been erected; and on the part of this officer no time was unnecessarily lost. But all his attempts were rendered ineffectual by the vigilance and foresight of Maurice, who, besides fortifying his camp and all the approaches to it, had cut the dike of the Maese, and laid all the low grounds betwixt it and Bois le Duc under water. The garrison consisted of twelve hundred men, who, although they had mutinied against their officers, yet regarding the fort as their only pledge for the payment of their arrears, strenuously exerted themselves in its defence.

But perceiving that, notwithstanding their most vigorous efforts, Maurice was making daily progress in the siege, and having no prospect of deliverance, they listened to a proposal which was made to them by the prince, in order to save time, and agreed to surrender the fort for a sum of money equal to their arrears³⁷. Immediately after which, conscious that they had committed an unpardonable crime against the Spaniards, they enlisted in the army of the United States; and as they knew that they could not expect quarter in case they should fall into the hands of their former masters, they were on many occasions of singular use, by the desperate intrepidity which they displayed³⁸.

 having on no former occasion exerted greater di-

 to prosecute the approaching campaign with extraordinary vigor, in the hopes of making some important conquests before the mutineers were persuaded to return to their duty. All their en-

Convention of the states
 at Brussels

The states of the provinces subject to their authority, having been lately convened at Brussels, Albert represented to that assembly that, as the source of all the disorders which prevailed was his inability to discharge the arrears due to his troops,
 it was necessary they should grant him an extraordinary supply. He had reason to expect that ere long he should receive remittances from Spain;
 but the demands of the mutineers must be immediately satisfied, otherwise there was ground to dread that the most pernicious consequences would ensue.

The states replied, by expressing their apprehension of these consequences, and by giving him
 the strongest assurances of their attachment and fidelity; but insinuated that, considering the exhausted state of the provinces, and the difficulty

which the court of Spain had ever found in supporting so great a number of forces, no other effectual remedy could be applied to the present disorders but an accommodation with the revolted states.

They had conceived hopes at this time that an accommodation might be brought about by the mediation of ambassadors, whom the emperor had sent into the Netherlands, in order to procure a restitution of some towns on the German frontier, of which the contending parties still retained the possession. The ambassadors found no difficulty in accomplishing the object of their commission; and having passed over into Holland, they prevailed on the United States to send deputies to Bergen op Zoom, to negotiate a treaty with deputies sent thither by the archdukes. But the Dutch being unalterably determined to maintain their independence, and discovering the same distrust of the archdukes, with which they had long been actuated towards the Spaniards, the conferences were no sooner begun than they were broken off, and both parties retired, extremely dissatisfied with each other.

While a reconciliation was thus, in vain, attempted between the archdukes and the United Provinces, a negotiation was begun for restoring peace between the queen of England and the king of Spain. Some advances had been made for this purpose to the English ministers by the cardinal Andrew, while he was governor of the Netherlands, and neither of the courts at variance seemed

at this time to have been inclined to prolong the war. It was agreed that a congress should be held at Boulogne; and ministers were sent thither by the contending powers. But this negotiation likewise proved abortive, as the plenipotentiaries found it impossible to adjust the ceremonial among them to the satisfaction of their respective courts. The precedence had, from time immemorial, been yielded to the crown of England, by the kings of Castile and Arragon; and Elizabeth maintained that it still belonged to her, notwithstanding the union of these crowns, and the conquest of Granada, since Spain, considered as one kingdom, was greatly inferior to England in respect of antiquity, which was the only ground on which a point of this nature could properly be decided. But the Spanish ministers could not perceive the force of this reasoning. They claimed the precedence on account of the superior extent and power of the Spanish monarchy; and, even when Elizabeth, in order to prove the sincerity of her pacific disposition, offered to agree to an equality, they rejected this offer, and insisted that the superior dignity of the catholic king should be recognised. To this the queen as peremptorily refused her consent; and, soon afterwards, the plenipotentiaries left Boulogne.

This unexpected issue of the congress was matter of great joy to the United States. They had suffered much anxiety from the apprehension of losing to powerful an ally as queen Elizabeth; and now, when they were delivered from this apprehension, they resolved to improve to the utmost the advantages which they derived from her alliance, by employing the English forces, and as many of their own, as could be spared from the defence of the frontier-towns, in an invasion of Flanders. To form this resolution, they were encouraged by the mutiny of the Spanish troops; and they were, at the same time, earnestly solicited to carry it into execution by the merchants of Zealand, who were extremely desirous of dispossessing the archduke of the sea-ports in Flanders, which afforded shelter to some Spanish ships of war, by which their trade had lately received considerable interruption. In compliance with their request, it was agreed to undertake the reduction of Nieuport; and about the middle of June, the army, amounting to fifteen thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, set sail from Ramekins in Walcheren, the place of rendezvous, and landed in Flanders near Ghent. After reducing some small forts, prince Maurice led them towards Bruges, and passed almost within reach of the cannon of that place, not without hopes, which proved fallacious, that by the sight of so flourishing an army, and the late disasters which had befallen the archdukes, the inhabitants might have been induced to throw off the Spanish yoke, and return to their former connexion with the United Provinces.

From Bruges he marched towards Nieuport, and, by the way thither, made himself master, with little difficulty, of certain forts called St. Albert, and jewels, and deliver up to them the funds appropriated to the support of her court and servants. This speech, joined to her majestic air and manner, produced a powerful effect upon the minds of the soldiers, who received it with shouts of high applause, and called out to her that they were ready to expose their lives to every danger in her defence. Albert, on this occasion, omitted nothing in his power to confirm them in their present disposition, and acquainted them that he was determined to fight at their head, and to share their fortune.

Agreeably to his resolution, having joined his army at Bruges, he set out with it from thence about the end of June. His first object was the reduction of the forts above mentioned, in which his success corresponded with his most sanguine hopes. The garrisons which Maurice had left in these forts, were intimidated by the sight of so great a force, and after a feeble resistance surrendered them, on condition, that they should be suffered to depart with their arms and baggage. The archduke himself subscribed the capitulation; but, though his intention was sincere, he could not protect the garrison of Snaerfeerck, consisting of two companies of soldiers, from the fury of the Spanish mutineers, who fell upon them, notwithstanding their officers prohibition, and put them all to the sword.

Prince Maurice being at the same time informed of the surrender of the forts, which he had expected would have held out much longer,

BOOK and of the near approach of the enemy, was
I. thrown into great perplexity. From his confi-1690. dence of bringing the siege to a speedy conclusion, he had neglected to fortify his camp; the number of his troops was not sufficient to enable him both to continue the siege, and to oppose the enemy in the open field; and he had even reason to dread, from the rapidity of their march, that he should not have leisure before their arrival, to put himself into a proper posture of defence.

In order to retard their progress, and to gain
 as much time as possible, he immediately dispatched his kinsman, count Ernest of Nassau, with two regiments of foot, consisting of Zealanders and Scots, and four troops of horse, to seize on the bridge of Lestingen, by which the enemy must pass in their way to Nieuport. But before count Ernest could reach this place, they had advanced, and taken possession of it. Ernest however, knowing how necessary it was to afford time to Maurice to prepare for their reception, resolved, how fatal soever the consequences should prove to himself and his detachment, that he would not retire without fighting: and this generous resolution was happily attended with the desired effect. Albert, believing that Maurice's whole army must surely be at hand, spent a considerable time in making the proper dispositions for a general engagement. At length, being informed that Ernest's troops had received no augmentation since their first appearance, and that no other part of the enemy's army was in sight, he gave orders for an attack. The troops under Fr- nest kept their ground for some time; but, the horse having quickly given way, they were over- powered by numbers, and obliged to retire. In this action, upwards of five hundred of the Scots were slain, with many officers of distinguished reputation **.

July 2.

The archduke's hopes were greatly heightened by this success, and he wrote to Isabella that having with so great facility discomfited the van-guard of the enemy's army, he expected soon to inform her of the defeat of the whole. He judged, however, that there was ground to hesitate with regard to the conduct which it was proper to pursue; and, in order to assist him in forming his resolution, he called a council of his most experienced officers. Gaspard Zapena, a Spaniard of great experience, was of opinion that it was altogether unnecessary, and would therefore, in the present circumstances, be extremely imprudent to risk a battle. The enemy's general, through his confidence of being able to reduce Nieuport before an army could be assembled to oppose him, had brought himself into the most dangerous situation in which he had been ever placed. He durst not, now, in the face of so powerful an army, continue his operations against the town. His communication with Ostend was intercepted, since the archduke was fortunately situated between him and that place; and, should he attempt to make his escape by sea, when his highness was

BOOK 1.
1600. ready to fall upon him, in the hurry of embarkation, the greatest part of his troops must be cut to pieces. He therefore thought that the archduke ought not immediately to advance, with a design to attack the enemy; but ought rather to take the proper measures for reducing them, without exposing himself to the chance of a battle; and if he did, he believed, that ere long he would be able to oblige the enemy to lay down their arms. But whether his opinion on this head should be rejected or embraced, it was at least necessary that, before he advanced any further, he should procure information of the situation of the enemy, of which he was entirely ignorant; and, before adventuring to attack them, should wait for the arrival of Velasco, who in a few days would join him with a reinforcement of three thousand troops.

This prudent council was warmly opposed by the sieur la Barlotte, an old Flemish commander, of no less experience than Zapena, but whose courage, notwithstanding his advanced age, still bordered on temerity. He maintained that the present favorable opportunity of attacking the enemy ought not to be suffered to escape; that the archduke would find them entirely unprepared for their defence, intimidated by the rapidity of his approach, and disheartened by the defeat which their troops, under Ernest of Nassau, had so recently sustained; that, as the advantages he must derive from these circumstances, were more than sufficient to compensate for the want of the troops under Velasco, so his inferiority in number to the enemy was more than counterbalanced, by the superior discipline and bravery of his troops; that his troops were at present animated with the highest degree of ardor; and that the delaying to lead them forward, when they were so eager to engage, would only serve to damp their alacrity, while it would afford leisure to the enemy, either to fortify their intrenchments, or to secure their retreat.

This reasoning was received with high applause by a great majority of the council; and the soldiers, especially the Spanish mutineers, impatient to advance, could hardly be restrained.

Albert, however, being strongly impressed with a sense of the solidity of Zapena's reasons for delay, still hesitated as to which of the councils given him, he should embrace; when chance, which often directs the most important events, contributed to fix his resolution. The army having a view from their present situation of the sea-coast, a great number of ships were seen in their course from Nieuport to Ostend. The Spaniards prepossessed with the idea that the enemy durst not wait for their approach, concluded that they had already begun their flight, and that, at least, a part of them were on board the ships which they observed. Albert himself too readily yielded to this delusion; and instantly gave orders to his troops to begin their march. He was, at this time, only at the distance of a few miles from Nieuport, and, as he advanced with great rapidity,

I. about mid-day, and his whole army about four 1600. or five hours before sun-set.

He soon discovered how greatly he and his officers had erred in their conjectures with regard to the conduct and situation of the enemy. Far from meditating flight, prince Maurice had ordered his fleet to quit the coast, and retire to Ostend; by which prudent measure, he at once gave his army proof of the confidence which he reposed in them, and reduced them to the alternative of death or victory. He had withdrawn all his troops from the siege, except a number which he judged sufficient to restrain the sallies of the garrison. He had advanced to a little distance from the town, partly to encourage his troops, by showing that it was not with reluctance that he had resolved to accept of battle; and partly because the situation of the ground was more convenient for drawing them up in the order which he most approved.

Besides his Dutch forces, he had several regiments of British, French, and Swiss, commanded by officers of distinguished merit, who had acquired the most consummate knowledge of the military art in the civil wars of France, and in the Netherlands; and these men, he well knew, from long experience, would execute his orders with equal skill and valor.

He thought it necessary, however, to encourage and animate the troops, and for this purpose he rode from rank to rank, reminding them that they were about to engage with an enemy who were not only inferior in numbers, and fatigued with their march; but, who, in the manner of their approach, had given proof of extreme temerity: that it entirely depended on themselves whether they should return to their country and their friends, crowned with glory and victory, or be cut to pieces by an enemy over whom they had often triumphed, and have their names for ever covered with infamy. From his confidence in their bravery, he had ordered the transports to leave the coast; and he now led them on to battle, under a conviction that they would follow the example which he would set before them, and resolve either to die or conquer. These exhortations were every where received with the most joyful acclamations; and the whole army seemed to be animated with that intrepid spirit which he wished to inspire.

He gave the command of his van-guard to sir Francis Vere, that of his main body to the count of Solms, and of the rear-guard to Oliver Vander Tempel, lord of Corbeck. He distributed his cavalry, commanded by count Lewis of Nassau, partly in the front, and partly on the flanks, and having taken no particular station to himself, he was at liberty to go from place to place, where-soever he found his presence necessary. He was accompanied by his brother the celebrated prince Frederic Henry, who was only sixteen years of age[†]; and by the duke of Holstein, the prince of Anhalt, the count of Coligni, lord Gray, and fir Robert Drury, grandson of the famous admiral of that name, and by several other noblemen of the first rank, in the different protestant states in Europe, who had lately come into the Netherlands to improve themselves, by his lessons and example, in the art of war.

Having drawn up his army upon the downs by the sea-shore, and planted his artillery on some of the highest of the little hills of sand of which the downs are formed, he resolved, in that posture, to wait for the enemy's approach. Albert was greatly disappointed, when he found him so well prepared for his defence; and he was somewhat discouraged when he observed, that from the position he had made choice of, the Spanish army would have both the sun and the wind in their face: the latter of which circumstances he dreaded would prove particularly inconvenient, from the light sandy soil on which they were about to engage. It was now, however, too late to entertain the thoughts of a retreat; and his troops were as confident and as eager and impatient for the combat as before. They had long cherished a contempt of the enemy; and they were now heard in all the ranks uttering threats, that they would give no quarter to any of the heretics, except prince Maurice and his brother, whom they would reserve to adorn the triumph of their general.

Henry insisted that he should be permitted to remain and to share his brother's fate.

The battle was begun by the Spanish cavalry, under Mendoza, admiral of Arragon, who endeavoured to gain the flank of the Dutch army, by advancing along the sands between the sea and the downs; but Maurice, having foreseen that this might be attempted, had made provision against it, by planting cannon on the sands, and ordering some of his ships of war to approach the shore as near as possible. Mendoza was therefore unable to effectuate his purpose, and was obliged to retire, after having sustained considerable slaughter.

In the mean time, the two armies, after a discharge of their artillery, having advanced within musket-shot of each other, the English forces in the van, under sir Francis Vere, were attacked by the Spanish mutineers, who, in order to retrieve their honor, displayed on this occasion the most desperate intrepidity. The British troops received their assault undaunted, and for some time withstood their fury; their general had his horse shot under him, and was twice wounded. Still, however, he maintained his ground, refusing to give any attention to his wounds, till his brother, sir Horatio Vere, arrived with fresh troops to his relief. These troops, while engaged in combat, with the mutineers, having been vigorously attacked in flank by the Spanish cavalry, were thrown into disorder, and many of them began to fly towards the shore.

But the battle was instantly restored. Prince Maurice, having divided his army into battalions, ordered two of those which composed his main body to advance; and by them, the Spaniards were in their turn compelled to retreat, and time afforded to the British troops to rally. In support of the Spaniards, the archduke brought forward his Walloons and the Irish, and with their assistance, the mutineers would once more have regained their superiority, had not Maurice, without delay, led on another fresh battalion, consisting of Swiss, and of those Walloons who had surrendered to him the fort of Saint Andrew. The British forces likewise returned to the charge; and soon after, the whole of both armies, horse and foot, were engaged from one wing to the other.

The Dutch cavalry, commanded by count Lewis of Nassau, who, in this battle highly distinguished himself by his activity and valor, proved in every rencounter an overmatch for that of the enemy, and having broken their ranks, drove them with great slaughter from the field of battle.

The combat was better supported by the Spanish infantry; where Albert himself was present, exposing himself to every danger, and sometimes mingling with the foremost combatants. His troops, in every quarter, gave proof of the most determined bravery. The battle had lasted for more than three hours; during which time, notwithstanding the fatigue of their rapid march from Lessingen, they had fought without intermission, and often repulsed the fresh battalions of the enemy. From the beginning, they had been extremely incommoded with the sun and wind in their face, and still more with the dust or sand.

The Dutch artillery too had kept up a constant fire upon them during the whole engagement, and having been not only planted on higher and firmer ground with planks under it to prevent it from sinking in the sand, but better served and more skilfully directed, it had made great havoc among the Spanish troops. Still, however, they preserved their ranks, and seemed determined sooner to lay down their lives, than yield to an enemy, whom they had been so much accustomed to despise. Albert had made several attempts to get to the windward of the enemy, but had been as often prevented by the prudent precautions and vigilance of prince Maurice. At length, having thrown off his helmet, that he might be the more easily distinguished by his men, he received a wound in the ear with a pike, and was obliged to retire. Through some accident, his horse, which was conspicuous, fell into the hands of the enemy. His troops observed this, and believing that he himself had been taken prisoner, or killed, were greatly disheartened. They still kept their ranks; but in the languor of their exertions, they gave manifest symptoms that both their strength and courage had begun to fail.

This abatement of their vigor did not escape the vigilant eye of Maurice, who instantly resolved to improve the advantage which it afforded him; and for this purpose, having collected his whole force, he renewed the assault upon the enemy in front, with his infantry, and with his cavalry in flank. It happened, at the same time, that the

B O O K Spanish magazine of gun-powder, designed for the
1. use of the artillery, took fire. The Dutch caval-
1600 ry availed themselves of the confusion which this accident occasioned, and pushed forward with irresistible force, crying out, Victory, victory! This cry being instantly communicated to the rest of the army, animated them with redoubled ardor. The Spaniards, unable any longer to resist their fury, gave way on every side, and falling soon after into confusion, betook themselves to flight. The victors pursued for some time, and put great numbers to the sword; but the night coming on, the prince gave orders for sounding a retreat. His troops, he knew, must be exceedingly exhausted and fatigued, as they had taken no food since the morning, and, almost the whole day, had either stood under arms, or been engaged in battle: besides that, he was well acquainted with the intrepid spirit of the enemy, who might rally and return when he was unprepared for resistance, and most of his troops employed in the pursuit. For this reason, he selected such of them as had suffered least from the fatigue which they had undergone, and stationed them as a guard to the rest of the army, who remained all night on the field of battle.

The cotemporary historians differ widely in their accounts of the number of the slain. On the part of the Spaniards, Reidan, an historian who is generally well informed, says that it amounted to five thousand, but Grotius makes it only three thousand; while the loss on the side of the

the victors did not exceed one thousand: and the greatest part of these, he says, were of the English troops, who distinguished themselves by their intrepidity in this engagement, and had eight of their captains killed, and all the rest wounded, except two.

The British officers were almost the only persons of distinction who fell in the army of the states; but in that of the army of the archduke, besides so great a number of his best troops, Zapena, and colonels Bastock, de Lasso, d'Avalos, and many other officers of great merit, were either killed in the field of battle, or died afterwards of their wounds. The admiral of Arragon and de Vigliar were taken prisoners; and the count de Bucquoi, Barlotta, and many others wounded, and rendered long unfit for service. All the Spanish artillery, baggage, and provisions, with more than a hundred standards, fell into the hands of the victorious army⁴². Such was the battle of Nieuport, or, as it is sometimes called, the battle of the Downs, the event of which proved so extremely different from what the confidence of the Spaniards and their generals had prompted them to expect. Their defeat was, no doubt, partly owing to the disadvantages under which they fought; although it was acknowledged by all parties that nothing could surpass the prudence, ⁴² Among the Italians who fell in this battle the cardinal Bentivoglio mentions his brother and his nephew, two young noblemen, about twenty years of age, who had lately entered into the service of Spain, and were much regretted on account of their youth and bravery.

B O O K vigor, and intrepidity, which prince Maurice
 1. displayed from the beginning to the end of the 1600. engagement. His skill in the siege of fortified towns had long been highly celebrated; but it now appeared that he was equally possessed of all the other talents which form a consummate general, and all Europe at this time resounded with his praise “.

Albert, having left the field of battle immediately after seeing his troops give way, arrived on the same night at Bruges, where he soon after set out for Ghent, and was there received by Isabella, with the same firm and masculine spirit which she had discovered upon the various reports that had reached her, first of his being killed, and afterwards of his being wounded and taken prisoner. He returned next day to Bruges, and there employed himself in collecting his scattered troops.

Prince Maurice, in the mean time had retired on the next day after the battle to Ostend, to recruit his army in a place of safety, and to consult with the deputies whom the states general had sent thither to assist him with their advice. His enterprise against Nieuport was a measure which the states themselves had first suggested, and which Maurice had undertaken at their desire. It does not appear that he himself had approved of this measure; and it was strongly condemned by his kinsman, count William of Nassau, whom the Dutch historians celebrate as a person of the most consummate prudence.

To lead the army so far into the enemy's country as Nieuport, trusting to an event so extremely uncertain as the continuance of the mutinous spirit of the Spanish troops, William had represented as a rash and dangerous enterprize, by which the existence of the commonwealth would be exposed to imminent danger for the sake of acquiring a single town. That, even although they should conquer Nieuport, yet the great expense of defending a place at so great a distance from them would more than counterbalance all the advantages they could derive from the possession of it; and that, if the archduke should be able to appease the mutineers, the army of the states might suffer a defeat, or, they might be reduced by famine, as the supplying them with provisions would entirely depend on the winds and waves.

These apprehensions had hitherto been happily disappointed; but from the events which had fallen out, it manifestly appeared how much reason there had been for entertaining them. The mutineers had easily been persuaded to return to their duty. The archduke had in due time collected a sufficient force; and if he had listened to the counsel that was given him by Zapena, and waited for the arrival of Velasco, without precipitating an engagement, the army of the states would probably have either been obliged to lay down their arms without fighting, or in the hurry of attempting to get on board their ships, the greater part of them would have been destroyed.

 most dreadful apprehensions. From these apprehensions they were now happily delivered; but being still impressed with a sense of the danger
 which they had so narrowly escaped, they thought that, notwithstanding the great advantage they had obtained, there was ground for hesitating whether it was expedient to persevere in the plan of operations that had been begun.

They gave proof on this occasion, by the slowness of their deliberations, how much wiser it had been on the part of the states to have left prince Maurice at perfect liberty with regard to the conduct of the war, than to require him, as they had done, to follow the opinion of men who, from their ignorance of military affairs, were so extremely ill qualified to advise. They differed widely in their opinions from each other; and while some thought that the army ought immediately to return to Nieuport, others were of opinion that it ought rather to penetrate into the interior parts of Flanders. The former of these opinions at length prevailed; and on the fourth or fifth day after the battle, the siege of Nieuport was resumed.

This measure ought either not to have been adopted, or carried sooner into execution. The archduke, having exerted great activity in repairing the faults which he had committed, had sent Velasco , with a reinforcement to the garrison of Nieuport of two thousand five hundred men, who having marched with great expedition, had entered the town before prince Maurice had invested it. The operations however of the siege were renewed; but the garrison, after making some vigorous sallies on the besiegers, soon convinced prince Maurice that he could not justly expect to reduce them before the archduke would arrive with another army, which he was collecting together for their relief.

Moved by this consideration, and dreading that he might soon be again involved in the same danger, from which he had so recently escaped, he raised the siege, and having led back his troops to Ostend, he put them on board the transports which the states had provided for that purpose, and returned to Holland; judging it impracticable, on account of the difficulty of his situation, in the heart of the enemy's country, to derive any advantage whatever from the decisive victory he had obtained **.

The greatest part of the season fit for action still remained; but both parties were greatly exhausted with the exertions which they had already made, and no other memorable transactions passed during the course of the present year.”

In Spain, the operation of the several causes of decline, above-mentioned, was at this time sensibly felt in every department of the state. Complaints were heard all over the kingdom of the neglect of agriculture and the decay of manufactures; and great numbers of the people, being without employment, were reduced to a state of indigence, which rendered it possible for them to contribute their proportion of the taxes and supplies.

Several councils were held to consider of the proper remedies for those evils; but the duke of Lerma, and the other Spanish ministers, appear to have been extremely ignorant of the causes from which they proceeded. They supposed them to have risen principally from the scarcity of practised surgery in Paris, where, having been employed in his profession by count Charles of Mansfeldt, when he commanded the Spanish troops in France, the count took an attachment to him, and gave him a commission among his troops. He soon distinguished himself by his activity and enterprise, obtained the highest military honors, and was considered as one of the ablest officers in the service of Spain. His low birth, joined to his native arrogance and presumption procured him many enemies among his inferiors and equals: but the archduke was sincerely sorry for his death.

money: and this they ascribed partly to the great quantities of plate that were employed in the churches, and in the houses of the rich, and partly to the exportation of gold and silver for the purchase of foreign manufactures.

But as no expedient occurred at present to prevent the latter of these practices, while the manufactures of Spain were at so low an ebb, they resolved immediately, if possible, to put a stop to the progress of the former; and, with this view, a royal edict was published, requiring all churches, corporations, and individuals of whatever rank within the kingdom, to deliver upon oath, to certain magistrates who were named, an exact inventory of all the plate, whether gold or silver, in their possession. In the body of the edict this reason for the publication was assigned, that from the information which his majesty had received, there was ground to believe the quantity of the precious metals in plate and in church utensils to be so enormous, that, if it were converted into coin, and circulated throughout the kingdom, it would be found sufficient to restore the nation to that happy state of wealth and prosperity which it had formerly enjoyed; and that, for this reason, the king had, with the advice of his present counsellors, resolved, not only to prevent the farther increase of plate, but afterwards, under the severest penalties, to prohibit the exportation of it to foreign states.

But it was soon found impracticable to carry this edict, which would not probably have been in

The clergy were highly incensed because the sacred utensils were comprehended in it; and, both in writings and harangues from the pulpit, they represented the edict as an attack upon the privileges of the church. Neither Philip, nor his minister, the duke of Lerma, had resolution to contend against an order of men whom they dreaded, and whose favor they had been above all things solicitous to conciliate. Their design was therefore suddenly relinquished, and no other attempt made, on the present occasion, to remedy the disorders which prevailed.

It was not probable that any effectual remedy could be applied to them, till peace should be established with England and the United Provinces. Notwithstanding which it was judged necessary, for the reasons formerly mentioned, to continue the prosecution of the war against both these powers, without regard to the prejudice which from thence the monarchy was likely to sustain²⁷. Orders were given for the equipment of a fleet to support the Catholics of Ireland in their rebellion against Elizabeth, and both money and a reinforcement of Italian and Spanish troops were sent into the Netherlands.

The archduke had at the same time prevailed upon the states assembled at Brussels to grant him much greater supplies than formerly; and these he employed in making numerous levies in Germany, and the Walloon or southern provinces. The enemy however was sooner prepared to take the field. Prince Maurice, having drawn his army out of winter-quarters, early in the spring, and ordered them to rendezvous in the neighbourhood of the fort of Schenck, seemed for some time to intend an attack on Bois le Duc; but it soon appeared that his real design was to attempt the reduction of Rhinberg; the possession of this important place being necessary in order to facilitate the expulsion of the Spaniards from Guelderland, a part of which was still subject to their authority.

The archduke no sooner received intelligence of his design, than he ordered count Herman of Berg to set out with a body of troops to reinforce the garrison; but before the count had time to execute his commission, Maurice had drawn lines of circumvallation round the place, and fortified the approaches to his camp in such a manner, as rendered all access impracticable. Albert had therefore no other expedient for saving Rhinberg left, but to make a diversion, by attacking some important place belonging to the United States, in the hopes that Maurice might be thus induced to abandon his present enterprise.

At the earnest request of the people of Flanders, he resolved to lay siege to Ostend; the garrison of which place, though somewhat checked by adjacent forts, had been able to make incursions into the heart of the province, and often laid the inhabitants of the open country under the most burdensome contributions.

B O O K The states of this province , notwithstanding
 I. the peculiar hardships under which they labored,
 1601. had discovered great alacrity in raising their proportion of the supplies lately granted to the archduke ; and they now promised strenuously to exert themselves in furnishing him with every thing necessary for carrying on the siege with vigor.

Such were the motives by which Albert was influenced in forming his resolution to undertake the siege of Ostend ; the most hazardous enterprise in which he had ever been engaged , and which was attended with more important consequences , than any other which occurs in the history of the Netherlands.

Description of Ostend.

Ostend stands on the sea-coast , in a marshy soil , and almost surrounded with canals ; two of which being much larger than the rest , and communicating with the sea , receive smaller vessels at all times , and at high-water , admit of ships of a considerable magnitude. It was an open fishing-town , till the year 1572 , when it was first fortified with a palisade by the duke of Alva. At the pacification of Ghent , the inhabitants having thrown off the Spanish yoke , the fortifications were so much strengthened and augmented by the United States , that the duke of Parma , who invested it in the year 1583 , despairing of success , abandoned his enterprise , and could never afterwards be persuaded to resume the siege.

Ostend is divided into two parts , called the Old and the New Town. The former of these is washed by the sea, against the ravages of which it was secured by a strong fortification, formed of huge and well compacted beams or palisades; and the latter was defended by a wall flanked with bastions, and the canals already mentioned, to which there had lately been added a covered way, fortified with numerous redoubts. As, from the situation of Ostend, on the coast of Flanders, it afforded a convenient shelter to the ships of the United Provinces, the states had ever been extremely solicitous for its preservation. They had spared no expense in rendering the fortifications as complete as possible, and besides a numerous garrison under the command of an experienced officer, they had always kept it richly furnished with provisions and military stores. Nor were these the only circumstances which had deterred the duke of Parma from renewing his attempt against it. He considered, what was of much greater importance than even the strength of the place, that while the Dutch preserved their superiority at sea, the garrison might continue to receive whatever supplies and reinforcements they should stand in need of, till his strength and resources being exhausted, he should be compelled to raise the siege. To this consideration, the archduke seems not to have paid that attention which it merited. He did not possess the same military skill as the duke of Parma, and could not therefore so clearly perceive the difficulties he must encounter in his intended enterprise. He was not by nature bold or rash; yet, from the BOOK facility of his temper, he was apt too readily to

I. adopt the rash imprudent measures that were re-1601. commended by his counsellors ⁴⁸.

Having set out with his numerous army about the end of June, he began his operations against Ostend on the 4th or 5th of July. Prince Maurice, in the mean time, who secretly rejoiced to observe his enemy engage in so dangerous an undertaking, persisted in the siege of Rhinberg; and in a few weeks, notwithstanding the most vigorous defence on the part of the garrison, he compelled them to capitulate.

Rhinberg
capitulates

But the attention of both parties was now almost totally engrossed by the siege of Ostend; where Charles Vander Noot the governor, before the besiegers had time to complete their intrenchments, had sallied out upon them, and killed upwards of five hundred men. This unfortunate beginning, however, did not deter the archduke from the prosecution of his enterprise.

Ostend.

Having taken the necessary precautions to prevent the future sallies of the garrison, and stationed one part of his troops in the downs to the westward of the town, and the rest of them on the south and east, he soon opened his batteries, and began a furious cannonade in every quarter. But his distance from the body of the place, occasioned by the canals, ditches, and other outworks, which the industry of the besiegers had greatly multiplied, rendered his fire of small effect; and showed him that it must long remain impossible to compel the garrison to surrender, unless he could prevent them from receiving reinforcements and supplies by sea.

⁴⁸ Vide Bentivoglio, Le Clerc, and Grotius. Thuanus, lib. vi. p. 76, etc.

In this opinion he might have been confirmed by the proof which the United States had lately given, how much they were determined to exert themselves with vigor in the defence of the place. Though Vander Noot was an officer whom they highly esteemed, yet they had taken from him the chief command, and given it to sir Francis Vere, who, next to prince Maurice, was the most renowned of all their generals, for his military prudence and capacity; and to engage Vere to accept of this command, they had consented to his selecting the flower of the English forces, for a reinforcement to the garrison. They had, at the same time, sent to Ostend a copious supply of military stores and provisions; and were unanimous in resolving that whatever it should cost them, they would defend the town to the last extremity.

This resolution, and the vigor which the states had begun to display, drew the attention of all Europe to the operations of this important siege; and with the permission of the states, the town was visited by many illustrious foreigners, from Germany, Denmark, France, and England , who were led there by curiosity to view so interesting a scene of action, and the

B O O K desire of being thereby enabled more clearly to com-

 the contending parties.

The archduke had ground for much solicitude with regard to the final issue of his enterprize; but he could not now desist, without exposing himself to reproach and ridicule; and therefore he applied himself with redoubled ardor to the prosecution of the siege.

It might be brought to a period, he imagined, either by carrying it on in the ordinary form, by mines, batteries, and assaults, or by rendering himself master of the entrance of the canals, and thereby intercepting the communication of the garrison by sea, with the United Provinces. He ought naturely to have considered which of these two methods of procedure was the most likely to prove effectual, and to have confined his attention to one of them, without suffering it to be diverted by the other. But, instead of this, he employed his forces, sometimes in carrying on attacks upon the enemy's intrenchments, and sometimes in attempting to block up the canals; and, by this division of his strength, as the siege was protracted to an enormous length, so it was attended with an immense expense of blood and treasure.

For several weeks his principal object was to approach still nearer than where his batteries were first opened to the fortifications of the town. The garrison, on the other hand, omitted nothing in their power that could obstruct his approach. They adventured, on some occasions, to fall out, and to attack the besiegers sword in hand: and in the mean time, they labored indefatigably in casting trenches, and raising new redoubts, wherever they apprehended there was danger of the enemy's attempting an assault. An incessant fire was all the while kept up from the Spanish batteries, on the one hand, and the fortifications on the other; and great numbers were killed on either side.

At length, the archduke, perceiving that his operations were not attended with the success which he expected, had recourse to the other expedient above-mentioned, and employed a great part of his forces in attempting to obstruct the entrance of the canals. One of them was the entrance of the harbour, and here he began his operations. But, as all the ground to a considerable distance from the shore was sand, no mound which he formed of it, could sustain a battery, or resist the violence of the waves. He was therefore obliged to collect together from the neighbouring towns, a great quantity of huge beams, of which and bricks he resolved to form a dike at the mouth of the canal. The beams were driven deep into the ground, then bound together, and the intermediate spaces filled with bricks. Of this sort of building, one was piled upon another, till the whole was raised to a sufficient height; after which, being planted with a numerous battery of cannon, the enemy's ships 1601. But the hopes which Albert had from thence conceived, of being able to reduce the town by famine, were quickly frustrated by the ingenuity and great exertion of the governor and garrison. They instantly applied themselves to enlarge the mouth of the other canal, which passed through the heart of the town, and soon rendered it capable of receiving the largest ships.

The archduke, however, did not despair of being able to deprive them of this resource; and he immediately began the same sort of operations at the entrance on this canal, as those by which he had made himself master of the other. At first, his troops and pioneers proceeded with great alacrity, as they were sheltered from the fire of the besiegers, by a dike which had been raised to defend the town against the encroachments of the sea. But the garrison resolved to forego the advantage which they derived from this defence; and having strengthened their fortifications, as well as they could, by stakes, huge stones, and other materials fitted to repel the fury of the waves, they demolished the dike, and, as by this expedient, the Spanish works were exposed to the artillery of the town, and a great part of the adjacent country laid under water, the archduke was obliged to draw off his troops to a greater distance, and to have recourse to other measures which required greater experience and time to carry into execution.

In the mean time, the states general of the United Provinces held frequent conferences to consider how they might best improve the leisure which they enjoyed, while the Spanish army was detained before Ostend. They wished to have made an attack on the island of Cadzant, and afterwards to have undertaken the reduction of Sluys. But, at the present juncture, they had neither the money nor the troops which prince Maurice thought necessary for so difficult an enterprise. The flower of their army had, after the taking of Rhinberg, been sent to Ostend; and the great expense which attended the defence of that place, had almost exhausted their finances. Much time was spent in deliberating, and various expeditions were proposed. At length, towards the end of October, when the season of action was nearly elapsed, they formed the resolution of undertaking the siege of Bois le Duc, the garrison of which important place, they understood, amounted only to three hundred men.

In obedience to their commands, though extremely diffident of success, prince Maurice immediately began his march, and having arrived before the place on the first of November, he judged, that, considering the great extent of the fortifications, the garrison must soon find it necessary to capitulate, provided he could prevent the entrance of more troops. With this view, he instantly began to draw lines of circumvallation round the town, and at first, this work was carried on with great rapidity. But soon afterwards, it was retarded by a violent frost, which happened, this year, much sooner than usual: and the archduke had time to send a large detachment of his army, above a thousand of which forced their way into the town, before the intrenchments were complete; while the rest lay at a little distance from the prince's camp, with the design of embracing any opportunity that might offer of annoying him. Still, however, he persisted in his design: but as the frost continued daily increasing in violence, and put an entire stop to his operations, he complied with the desire of the deputies of the states, who as usual, attended him in the camp, and raised the siege ⁵⁰.

November.

Maurice had no sooner retired from Bois le Duc, than Albert, having recalled his troops, resumed his operations, which had been suspended during their absence, against Ostend: and in a few days after, he had ground to entertain the hope of being able to terminate the siege. The fortifications of the town next the sea, had lately suffered considerable prejudice from the fury of the waves; and the garrison, through sickness and desertion, and the great numbers killed by fatigue and the incessant fire of the besiegers, was reduced from eight thousand to between two and three thousand men. Sir Francis Vere had given repeated notice of his distressful situation to the United States: but, till the raising of the siege of Bois le Duc, they had no troops which they could spare; and after troops were procured, and put on board the transports, they were prevented from sailing by contrary winds. About the same time, the archduke had ordered a select body of forces to pass over the harbour at low-water, in the middle of the night, who set fire to a temporary defence, composed of huge piles of faggots and other combustible materials, which had been placed at the foot of the rampart, on the north side of the town, to prevent the further encroachments of the sea. The fire burnt furiously for three days and nights, baffling all the attempts of the garrison to extinguish it. The rampart was thus much weakened, and a greater number of men were necessary for its defence. In the midst of this distress, the governor received notice that the archduke had been assiduously employed in preparing for a general assault, and would certainly carry his design into execution on the next day, or, at farthest, on the day immediately following. Vere, though possessed of the most unquestionable courage, was too sensible of the present weakness of his garrison and fortifications, and too well acquainted with the persevering and intrepid spirit of the Spanish troops, not to be alarmed with the danger which threatened him; and, in order to avert it, he made use of an expedient to which a brave man will hardly, even when necessity requires it, have recourse. Without any serious intention of capitulating, he secretly sent over to the archduke an officer, to signify that he was ready to treat with him for the surrender of the town. Albert,

BOOK 1. 1601. suspecting no dissimulation, gladly listened to this proposal, and hostages were instantly exchanged. He came soon, however, to entertain some doubt of the governor's sincerity, and urged him, without delay, to propose his terms. This, the governor, by employing different pretexts, found means to defer from day to day, till a reinforcement of troops which he had expected, arrived from Zealand. This reinforcement consisted only of five companies, amounting to four hundred men. But finding that the archduke could not be any longer deceived, and having already gained sufficient time to repair the breaches in the rampart, he sent him word, that since his masters the states had augmented his garrison, he could not now, consistently with his honor, consent to give up the town.

As Vere had begun this transaction without communicating it to his officers, some suspicions were at first entertained of his fidelity by all such persons as were averse to a surrender; and the states general were not entirely satisfied, either with the duplicity he had employed, or the example which he had given of entering into a treaty with the enemy, without the knowledge of his council of war. But no person had so much reason to be offended as the archduke, who though he did not hesitate to send back the hostages was both incensed and mortified when he considered how he had been deceived by an enemy, whom he might probably have compelled to lay down his arms ¹¹.

The fortifications of the place were now more secure than formerly, and the garrison had been reinforced. Still, however, being moved by passion, more than the probability of success, he resolved to execute the design which the hopes of a capitulation had induced him to lay aside, and gave orders for a general assault. He intended to make his principal attack on the west, near the harbour, which had been for some time in his possession; but, in order to divert the enemies attention and divide their forces, he resolved at the same time to make attacks in other quarters, and gave the command of a body of troops, destined to act on the east side, to the celebrated count de Bucquoi; having committed the execution of his principal design to Augustin Mescia, an experienced officer, and governor of the citadel of Antwerp.

Early in the morning he began to play off his batteries, and kept up a furious cannonading in every quarter till midnight, when, the tide having gone back, Mescia led forward the Spanish troops. They were drawn up in a compact body, forty men in front, and the foremost ranks clothed in complete armour, followed by the musketeers and by others, who were provided with scaling ladders, and whatever else was judged necessary, either for acquiring or securing possession of the rampart. They advanced across the old harbour, in which there was between three and four feet water, with great ardor and the most determined intrepidity; but the garrison were well prepared for their defence. The governor had beforehand

I. of the fortifications where he expected their prin-

He had likewise instructed those to whom he had committed the charge of these mortars to keep up their fire till the enemy should approach. This order was well obeyed, and the Spaniards had almost reached the foot of the rampart, when the mortars were discharged, and made dreadful havoc among the foremost ranks: a great number was killed and wounded, and the ranks were thrown into confusion. Still, however, they continued to advance, those who were behind pushing forward those who were before, till the greater part of them were so near that every stroke and shot of the besiegers did certain execution. The night came on, yet the Spaniards seemed still determined to persist. To prevent a surprise, the governor ordered a great number of fires to be lighted up within the rampart, and the battle continued to be as bloody and desperate as before.

The Spanish troops at the same time crowded together in the harbour, ready to advance to fill up the places of those who fell; when the governor had recourse to an expedient which he had meditated from the beginning. There were two sluices within the fortification, one of which served in the time of ebb to keep the water in that part of the canal which lay within the town, and the other to restrain it in that part which ran up into the country. Having ordered both these sluices to be opened, so great a quantity of water was poured into the harbour, that many of the Spaniards were carried down by the violence of the stream, and drowned; while many others, attempting to save themselves by laying hold of the palisades on the rampart, were slaughtered by the enemy. The archduke had commanded his cavalry to keep close in the rear of the infantry to prevent them from having recourse to flight. It was thus rendered impossible for the latter to make their retreat so soon as necessity required; and by this means they were obliged to stand exposed to the fire of the besiegers, long after it was manifest that their most vigorous efforts could be of no avail. A part of the cavalry having entered the water, with a design to obstruct the violence of the current, several horses with their riders were likewise drowned, and Mescia at length found it necessary to give the signal of retreat. The assailants having been equally unsuccessful in every other quarter, were obliged to abandon the assault. In this rash and desperate enterprise about fourteen hundred of the Spaniards and Italians were either killed or drowned, among whom were several persons of the first rank, while the loss of the besiegers amounted only to forty killed, and a small number wounded⁵².

troops, who were highly exasperated at the barbarous, and what they deemed disgraceful manner in which they had been used. They bitterly complained that they had been treated like slaves or brutes, and not like soldiers of unquestionable bravery, when they were compelled by the cavalry to stand exposed to the enemy's fire, after the sluices being opened, it was rendered impossible for them to advance. They complained that this measure, which had been adopted without consent of the council of general officers, was contrary to every rule of war, and they declared, that since they had not been treated as soldiers, they would no longer act as such. Albert, foured with his ill success, was equally alarmed and provoked at this behaviour, and in order to prevent the infection of their example from spreading through the rest of his army, he instantly caused between forty and fifty of the most seditious to be executed, and sent a hundred and fifty to the galleys. By this prompt severity he quelled the mutiny, but, finding it necessary to relinquish his design of renewing the assault, he now bent his whole attention to the blocking up of the canal.

Spanish levies in Italy excite jealousies,

During the course of these transactions the court of Spain, notwithstanding their inability to furnish the archduke either with the troops or money necessary to insure success in his contest with the United States, was engaged in other expensive enterprises. By their order the count de Fuentes, governor of Milan, had some time before made such numerous levies of troops, as excited in the minds of the Italian states and princes an apprehension, which at the present period seems to have been without foundation, that some ambitious design had been conceived of reducing Italy under the Spanish yoke. Of these troops a part was sent to the archduke Ferdinand, to assist him in his operations at Canissa against the Turks; another part of them to the Netherlands; and the rest were intended for an expedition against Algiers, which was still the principal seat of those numerous pirates, by whom the coast and the ships of Spain continued to be no less molested than in the former reign. About ten thousand troops were employed in seventy galleys, partly Genoese and partly Spanish, commanded by the celebrated Doria, and they had a prosperous voyage till they were within a few days sailing of the destined port. Had they immediately landed, it is probable they would have succeeded in their enterprise, as the greater part of the pirates, agreeably to information which Doria had received, were absent, and such of them as had been left behind, were unprepared for their defence: but, unfortunately, one of the capital ships had been separated from the rest of the fleet, on which account the debarcation was delayed till next day; and in the intervening night a dreadful storm arose, which not only rendered all attempts to land impracticable, but

Invasion of Ireland.

The court of Spain was not discouraged by the failure of their attempt against Algiers, from engaging in another enterprize, which was still more difficult to be carried into execution. The war with England had not for several years been vigorously prosecuted by either of the two contending powers; and no event had happened which deserves to be recorded: but Philip, or more properly the duke of Lerma, had, about this time, conceived the hopes of being able to give a mortal wound to the power of Elizabeth, by an invasion of Ireland, where a great number of the natives were in open rebellion against her, under the earl of Tyrone.

Philip the Second, by various intrigues carried on by ecclesiastics, had fomented the discontents of the Irish, and on different occasions had sent them supplies of arms and military stores. Many of them had been engaged, by the kind treatment which he ordered to be given them, to enter into his service in the Netherlands: and of these, many having returned to their native country, had, through the knowledge which they had acquired, in some measure contributed to teach their countrymen the rules of military discipline, thereby rendering them a much more formidable enemy than they had hitherto been to the English troops.

⁵³ Thuanus, lib. cxxvi. Piaſecii Chronica, an. 1601.

Tyrone, whose affections Elizabeth had in vain endeavoured to conciliate, though noted for his treachery and cruelty, vices which generally attend on barbarous manners, yet, being brave and active, had persuaded many of his countrymen to enlist themselves under his banners, by flatteringly inspiring them with the hopes of deliverance from the English yoke. He had applied for assistance to the court of Spain, and being seconded in his application by several seminaries of English priests and Jesuits, solicitors the most likely to succeed with Philip and his minister, he had obtained a promise both of arms and troops.

A bull of excommunication having been published by three succeeding popes  against Elizabeth, absolving her subjects from their allegiance, and inviting all catholic princes to take possession of her dominions, the superstitious mind of Philip was easily impressed with a persuasion that, by supporting the rebels, and abolishing Elizabeth's authority in Ireland, he would act the meritorious part of a faithful son of the church, and serve the cause of God and of the catholic religion. And, although he had too much indolence to be capable of being principally actuated by ambition, yet he could not but desire to add Ireland to his dominions, as, besides the great extent and fertility of that island, its commodious harbours would occasionally afford a retreat and shelter to his ships, and better enable him to dispute the empire of the sea with England and the United Provinces.

Determined by these considerations, he gave orders for the equipment of a fleet of transports and ships of war, sufficient for carrying six thousand troops, and so confident was he and his minister of the success of their intended enterprise, that, besides the troops, a great number of families, including women and children, were put on board, with the design of establishing a Spanish colony in the kingdom which they expected to subdue. They had lent too easy faith to the exaggerated accounts which Tyrone had given them of his strength: and they were not sufficiently acquainted with the character and abilities of lord Mountjoy, whom Elizabeth had appointed viceroy and commander in chief of the English forces.

The command of the Spanish troops, and the conduct of the expedition, were committed to Don John d'Aguilar, who had learnt the rudiments of war under the duke of Alva, and had afterwards acquired some military reputation from a successful enterprise, in which he had the chief command, against the town of Blavet in Bretagne.

He set sail from Spain in the end of August, accompanied by some ships of war, under Don John Guevara, and arrived at Kinsale, in the south of Ireland, on the 8th of October: but a part of his transports having been separated from the rest of the fleet, he found, on his arrival at Kinsale, that he could muster only four thousand men. With this little army, he applied himself to strengthen the fortifications of the place, resolving to remain there, till he should be joined by Tyrone, or till the rest of his forces should arrive. The ships of war under Guevara returned immediately after the troops were landed; and, soon after, the harbour of Kinsale was blocked up by a squadron of English men of war, commanded by sir Richard Levison. Agreeably to his instructions from the court of Spain, d'Aguilar dispersed a manifesto, over the adjacent country, in which he assumed the title of general in the holy war, undertaken for the preservation of the catholic faith in Ireland; and whilst he invited people to come unto his assistance, he declared, that he was sent by his master the king of Spain, with no other intention but to deliver them from the dominion of the devil and the heretical queen of England.

The Irish had formerly, on different occasions, received the justest grounds of complaint against the English government; and at this time they were highly incensed on account of the introduction of what the English, with good reason, regard as one of their most valuable privileges, the institution of trials by jury; they were therefore generally animated with a spirit of discontent against their ancient masters. The greater part of them were likewise strongly attached to the popish faith; and their priests, who were wholly in the interest of Spain, possessed an entire ascendant over them, having persuaded them that their ancestors had originally sprung from Spain, and thereby 1602. They were discouraged, however, from complying with d'Aguilar's invitation to have recourse to arms, by considering the small number of troops which he had brought to their assistance; and they resolved to remain quiet till the arrival of the rest, which he had assured them would quickly follow.

The viceroy was, at this time, engaged in the prosecution of the war against Tyrone, in the northern parts of the island. His arms had been attended with great success; he had defeated several parties of the rebels, and had made prisoners of many of their leaders, some of whom he had sent to England. Tyrone himself, with his adherents, had fled before him, and taken shelter in those fastnesses in the northern provinces, where the marshy ground rendered it difficult for the English general to advance. Here, however, the rebel chief was in a manner besieged, and as the country was but little cultivated, he must ere long have been obliged, through the want of subsistence, to submit to the conqueror. In this critical situation were the affairs of the insurgents when the Spanish troops arrived. Upon receiving information of their arrival, the viceroy, justly dreading that the insurrection would soon become more general, resolved, without delay, to exert his utmost vigor against the invaders. With this intention, having left a part of his cavalry to watch the motions of Tyrone, he set out for Kinsale, and having marched with great rapidity, he soon arrived before the place, and began the siege with between eight and nine thousand men. But before he had time to make any considerable progress, he received notice that the Spanish transports above mentioned, which had been separated from the rest of the fleet, had arrived at Baltimore, with two thousand soldiers on board, under the command of an officer named Ocampo; and soon after he was informed, that the frost having set in with great violence in the marshy country where he had left Tyrone, that leader and his followers had made their escape over the ice, had joined Ocampo with upwards of four thousand men, who together with the Spaniards, were on their march to raise the siege of Kinsale. This alarming intelligence he procured by intercepted letters from Ocampo and Tyrone to Aguilar; and from these letters too he understood their plan of operations, the time of their approach, and the route which they intended to pursue. He therefore prepared himself for his defence; and, having drawn off the greater part of his army to an advantageous situation, at some distance from the town, he left no more forces than were sufficient to restrain the eruption of the Spaniards under Aguilar.

When Tyrone saw the English army so advantageously posted, and prepared for his attack, his courage failed; and notwithstanding the remonstrances of Ocampo, who reproached him with cowardice, he gave orders to his men to change

B O O K the direction of their march, hoping to reach a
I. marsh which lay near, and thus to avoid the ne-1602. cessity of fighting. But the viceroy, perceiving his intention, hastened forward with all his forces, and attacked him in the rear. Finding then that an engagement was unavoidable, he resumed his courage, and faced about to the enemy. But the rebels were no match in the open field for the English forces. They were quickly thrown into confusion, and put to flight. The Spaniards, who fought desperately for some time, being forsaken by their dastardly associates, were overpowered by numbers, and Ocampo himself with several officers, made prisoners. In this battle, above twelve hundred men were killed upon the spot; a great proportion of whom were Spaniards. The rest of that nation fled to Baltimore and other places
on the coast, in which they had left garrisons.
Such of the Irish as were taken, were hanged as rebels; the greater part of them, among whom was Tyrone, escaped through their knowledge of the country; but were totally dispersed.

It was easy for d'Aguilar, when he received intelligence of this defeat, and the cowardly behaviour of the Irish, to perceive how much the court of Spain had been mistaken in their judgement of the facility of establishing their authority in Ireland. There could be no secure dependence, he saw, on assistance from the natives; and no
army, which in the present state of the finances
could be sent from Spain, could be able to contend alone with the English forces. He resolved, therefore,

therefore, to employ all his influence to dissuade the king from persisting in so desperate an attempt: and, being at the same time conscious, that with so small a number of troops as were under his command in Kinsale, he could not justly expect to be able, above a few weeks, to defend the town against a general of so much skill and vigor as the viceroy, he resolved to save the lives of his soldiers, and to deliver the place into the hands of the English, provided he could obtain from them such terms as his honor would permit him to accept.

In a few days after the battle, he gave the viceroy notice of his intention, and explained to him the motives of his conduct, and the sentiments which he had come to entertain of the Irish rebels, and of the folly of the enterprise, into which the court of Spain, through misinformation, had been betrayed.

But he accompanied his offer with a declaration expressed in the strongest terms, that, in case the viceroy should refuse to grant him the conditions which he required, the honors of war to his troops, with a promise of transporting them and their cannon and ammunition to Spain, in English ships; and an act of indemnity to the inhabitants of Kinsale, by whom he had been so kindly received and entertained, he and his soldiers were unalterably determined to defend the town to the last extremity.

Lord Mountjoy could not but respect the spirit by which this declaration was dictated. He was

B O O K prompted by the native generosity of his disposition
 1. to comply with the terms proposed, and he thought
 1602. himself justifiable in point of prudence for complying with them, when he considered how much his army was likely to suffer in the operations of a siege, carried on in the middle of winter, against so brave and so determined an enemy.

Without hesitation, therefore, he agreed to d'Aguilar's demands. Kinsale, Baltimore, and some other forts, in the possession of the Spaniards, were delivered into the hands of the viceroy; and d'Aguilar with his troops, cannon, and ammunition, were soon after transported to Spain in an English fleet.

Philip, after hearing of the issue of the battle, having despaired of their preservation, greatly rejoiced at their arrival. He highly approved of the capitulation, and, with the advice of his counsellors, resolved, in consequence of the information which he received from d'Aguilar, to abandon the Irish rebels to their fate; and henceforth to apply himself with more undivided attention to his affairs in the Netherlands⁵⁵.

OF THE REIGN OF
PHILIP THE THIRD,
KING OF SPAIN.

BOOK II.

THE archduke, after the repulse of his army, as above related, by the garrison of Ostend, was advised by some of his principal officers to raise the siege. He was himself extremely reluctant to comply with this advice, but thought it necessary, before rejecting it, to know the sentiments of the court of Spain. Philip's ministers could judge of the propriety of his persisting in his enterprize, only by the information which he transmitted to them; and there is ground to believe that, having conceived an opinion that it would be inconsistent with his honor to relinquish it, his representation was calculated to make them think too lightly of the obstacles which it was necessary to surmount, and too highly of the importance of the place. They believed it to be impossible for the garrison to defend it much longer against so great a force, and they imagined that by the reduction of it

B O O K they might ruin the trade of the United Provinces, and thus insure success in the future operations of the war. It was therefore determined that the archduke should continue the siege, and that no assistance should be withheld which could enable him to bring it to the desired conclusion.

Their assistance on the present occasion was the more necessary, as his own finances were almost entirely exhausted, and he had little prospect of receiving any considerable support from the assembly of the states. He convened this assembly, however, and urged them, on account of the necessity of his affairs, to grant him an immediate supply. The deputies were liberal in their professions of loyalty; but, in return to his application, they represented that, in their present circumstances, it was impossible for them to comply with his request, as the province of Brabant had, almost every season, been obliged to pay the most exorbitant contributions to the enemy, and not only that province but several others had long been cruelly robbed and plundered by the mutineers.

Conscious of the truth of this representation, he could not persist in his demand, but was obliged to rest satisfied with what he received from the states of Flanders, who, being more deeply interested than the rest in the conquest of Ostend, contributed to the utmost of their power to assist him in carrying on the siege.

Having, since the failure of his late attempt, despaired of being able to reduce the garrison by storm, his principal object now was to intercept the communication with the United Provinces, by blocking up the entrance of the canal. For this purpose he brought engineers from Italy and other places, and, by their direction, various works were undertaken at an immense expense. But at the mouth of the canal their labor was rendered fruitless by the fury of the waves; and when they attempted to raise a dike and batteries on the banks of the canal, somewhat nearer to the town, they were not only exposed to the enemy's artillery, but were often interrupted by the garrison, who on different occasions sallied out upon them, destroyed their works, and put great numbers to the sword. In order to avoid the farther repetition of these disasters, they began at a distance from the canal, and out of the reach of the besieged, to construct huge machines, formed of beams strongly bound together, which, when finished, they intended to push forward to the banks of the canal, and on these, after covering them with turf, straw, and other materials, to erect their batteries. But the finishing of this, and other works which they attempted, required a considerable length of time; a great part of the present year was spent in preparing them, all the other operations of the siege were thus relaxed. In the mean time abundant supplies of stores and provisions were introduced into the town. The garrison, many of whom were sickly and wounded, was entirely changed. By the new garrison, consisting of select troops, partly British and partly

French and Dutch, all the damages which the fortifications had sustained were repaired; and so little dread was entertained of the success of the besiegers, that general Vere, with the consent of the states, went over to England, devolving the command, during his absence, upon the sieur Frederic de Dorp.

The defence of Ostend had cost the United Provinces about a hundred thousand florins each month, besides the pay of between six and eight thousand troops; yet, from the great increase of their commerce, joined to the frugality of their manners, they were not only able to bear the burden of this expense, but to maintain a considerable fleet, and at the same time to make so great an augmentation of their land-forces, that prince Maurice began his operations this campaign with twenty-four thousand foot and six thousand horse, a more powerful army than any former one which he had commanded since the commencement of the war.

The United States assisted by Henry IV. of France, and the queen of England.

In raising this army they were secretly favored by Henry IV. who permitted the sieur de Bethune, of the house of Melun, to levy troops for them in France; and in Germany, where they were befriended by some princes of the Protestant religion, they raised a body of two thousand four hundred horse. But their most useful ally was the queen of England, who furnished them with three thousand men to fill up the vacancies in the English regiments already in their service, and soon after sent them three thousand more. The obtaining of this reinforcement had been Sir F. Vere's principal object in going over to England, and he now returned from thence, and was appointed to the command of all the English forces.

The Spanish army, on the other hand, had not for many years been so much reduced in number as at the present period. Many had been killed, or had died of a pestilential disease, and of the hardships which they had undergone before Ostend; and the Italian and Spanish mutineers amounted to a considerable number; notwithstanding which, the court of Spain and the archduke were as obstinately as ever resolved to prosecute the siege. The United States rejoiced at their obstinacy, and hoped it might ere long prove fatal to their power in the Netherlands. They considered the present juncture as the most favorable for action which could occur, and therefore had resolved strenuously to exert themselves in attempting to make some important conquest in the southern provinces, which, in case the garrison of Ostend should be obliged to capitulate, might fully compensate for the loss.

They had conceived an expectation at this time that the people in the southern provinces, who had lately suffered great oppression from the rapacity of the mutineers, might be induced to shake off the Spanish yoke; and in this expectation they published a memorial addressed to the states of these provinces, enumerating the grievances which they must be conscious of having so long suffered; representing how much they had been

B O O K abused in the late king's transference of the sovereignty over them to the archdukes, notwithstanding which they were still as much as ever subject to the tyranny of Spain; and calling upon them, in remembrance of their first engagements, to return into their former connexion and alliance with their kinsmen in the United Provinces. In order to procure attention to this memorial, they resolved that their army should march into the heart of Brabant, to be ready to afford support to such of the inhabitants as should be willing to vindicate their liberty: and this measure, it is said, received the approbation both of the French monarch and the queen of England.

But prince Maurice could not be satisfied that it was either expedient or practicable. The people, he thought, were too much inured to the Spanish government, and too much overawed by citadels and garrisons, to listen to the invitation of the states; and he dreaded the difficulty of being able to support so numerous an army in an enemy's country for so long a time as would be necessary for the end in view. The Spanish army, indeed, could not at present contend with him in the open field; but they could harass him in his march, and intercept his convoys of provisions; besides, that the archduke was in daily expectation of receiving a reinforcement of troops from Spain and Italy¹.

Moved by these considerations, the states consented that, till it should appear whether their memorial was likely to produce the desired effect, he should lead his army along the east side of Brabant; that, by keeping it near the Maese, he might more easily receive supplies from the neutral powers in that neighbourhood. Having assembled his army at Nimeguen, he passed the Maese near Mark, and towards the end of June he had advanced as far as Maseyk, when he was obliged to stop for several days, through an unjustifiable action of his English troops, who having on their march sold a great part of the bread with which he had furnished them, could not procure any in the country where they now were, and were obliged to bring it from a considerable distance. This delay was, in the issue, attended with important consequences.

The archduke, having heard with much anxiety that Maurice had begun his march, had dispatched Mendoza, admiral of Arragon, who had lately been set at liberty, with six thousand foot and four thousand horse, to watch his motions, and, if possible, to obstruct his progress. Mendoza was come as far as Tienen, a fortified town in the centre of Brabant, and was there employed in casting up intrenchments to secure his troops. Could prince Maurice have immediately advanced, he might have attacked him with the highest probability of success. But through the delay occasioned by the improvident conduct of the English troops, Mendoza had not only full leisure to

II.

B O O K complete his intrenchments, but received a reinforcement of eight thousand men, under the
II. marquis of Spinola, who at this time arrived from 1602. Italy, and, if the prince could have hastened forward, might easily have been intercepted before he reached the Spanish camp. Maurice still however continued to advance, till he arrived within a little distance of the enemy, and once and again offered battle; but, finding that Mendoza was unalterably resolved to decline it, and was now too strong to be compelled, and considering how dangerous it must be, in the face of so great a force, to remain much longer in a country where it was so difficult to procure provisions, he returned hastily towards the Maese; and, about the middle of July, began to put in execution the only part of the general plan of his operations which he himself had judged practicable, by laying siege to the town of Grave.

Grave.

This place, one of the strongest in the Netherlands, and deemed of great importance, on account of its situation on the banks of the Maese, and its neighbourhood to the dominions of the states, had remained in the hands of the Spaniards, since the year 1586, when, as above related, the young baron de Harmont, involved himself in ruin and infamy, by surrendering it, without necessity, to the duke of Parma. It was defended, at this time, by Antonio Gonzalez, a Spanish officer of distinguished merit; and, as the archduke had before-hand dreaded the danger which impended over this important place, he had sent a body of select troops to reinforce the garrison, which, after their arrival, amounted to fifteen hundred men. From such a governor and garrison Prince Maurice expected to meet with the most vigorous resistance; and he could not doubt that Mendoza would quickly follow him, and attempt to compel him to raise the siege. But he did not despair of bringing his enterprise to a happy issue before the approach of winter, provided he could prevent the entrance into the town of any farther reinforcement and supply. With this view, he drew lines of circumvallation round his camp, extending from that part of the river which is above the town to that other part of it which is below. These lines were more than half a German league in length, of an extraordinary height and depth, and strengthened by a great number of redoubts planted with cannon. While this laborious work was going on, he reduced a fort belonging to the garrison, on the other side of the river, directly opposite to the town, and having stationed a part of his troops there, he next threw two temporary bridges over the Maese, one above, and the other below the town. When these works were finished, the town was completely invested on every side, and the garrison must, ere long, have found it necessary to capitulate: but, as he knew not what quantity of stores they possessed, and consequently was ignorant how long they might be able to sustain the blockade, he resolved, in order to save time, to carry on the siege in the usual form, and im-

B O O K

B O O K immediately began by opening trenches in different
 II. quarters, to make regular approaches to the town.

1602. A cotemporary historian², who upon the spot examined the various works which prince Maurice executed on this occasion, speaks of them as the most masterly which had ever been exhibited in any siege. In order the more effectually to save his men from the enemy's fire, the trenches were made of a greater depth than usual; both the workmen and soldiers were, at every approach, secured against the sallies of the garrison, by mounds and batteries; and when the trenches were advanced within a certain distance of the fortifications, spacious covered ways, of sufficient breadth to admit of carriages, were formed, which led from the trenches to the ditch. The garrison made frequent sallies, in which they displayed the most unquestionable bravery; but, through the precautions mentioned, they were as often repulsed with loss, while few of the besiegers were killed either in these sallies, or by the artillery of the place.

Mendoza had, in the mean time, advanced from Tienen as far as Venlo, which stands on the banks of the Maese, about twelve German miles higher than Grave, and there deliberated with his council of war, whether it was practicable to compel prince Maurice to raise the siege. But he quickly perceived how vain and ruinous it must prove to attack a numerous enemy in such strong intrenchments, for whom he was not an equal match in the open field; and therefore he resolved to rest satisfied with introducing a reinforcement of select troops into the place. Had this measure been attended with success, it must have rather served to hasten than to retard the surrender, as the stock of provisions in the town must thereby have been sooner consumed. It was adopted, however, by Mendoza, who was probably more influenced by the dread of the reproach which he would incur, if he made no attempt, than by the prospect of any advantage that could accrue from it.

B O O K

II.

1602.

The execution of this enterprise was committed to an Italian general of the name of Spina; who was ordered, with a thousand chosen troops, to attack the enemy's intrenchments in the night, at a place where they appeared to be the weakest, and to attempt to force his way across their camp into the town.

Another party, equal in number, was appointed to support him, and, in case of a repulse, to secure his retreat; while a third detachment was sent to make a feigned attack in another quarter, in the hopes of dividing the attention of the besiegers, and thereby rendering it easier for Spina to execute his design. But prince Maurice was every where upon his guard. The Spaniards were repulsed; and, leaving behind them their carriages, with their scaling ladders, and other apparatus, they fled precipitately to their camp.

Mendoza, now despairing of success, retired with his whole army towards Maestricht, and, a Sept. 20.

B O O K few days after, the garrison capitulated upon honorable terms¹.

11. During the course of these transactions the contending parties exerted themselves at sea, with somewhat greater vigor, than for several years preceding. The court of Spain had, before the present period, sent a squadron of gallies to cruise on the coast of Flanders, under the command of Frederic Spinola, a Genoese nobleman, who had served under the duke of Parma, and given some distinguished proofs of vigor and abilities. From this squadron the Dutch trade had sustained considerable prejudice: and Spinola, encouraged by his success, having gone himself to Madrid to solicit an augmentation of his fleet, had obtained six gallies more, which he had conducted in safety into the harbour of Sluys. This harbour afforded him the most commodious shelter and retreat. His gallies lying at anchor in the canal which leads to it, issued forth against the enemy when they were least prepared to oppose them, and either took or sunk a great number of their trading vessels. With a more numerous squadron, and a greater number of soldiers on board, he would have ventured to a greater distance from the coast, and thus have in some measure intercepted the communication of Ostend with Holland and Zealand. He could likewise have sometimes ventured to make a descent upon their coasts; or have entered their harbours and canals, and seized or burnt their shipping.

Impressed with a conviction that from such spirited naval enterprises the enemy must suffer more essentially than from the siege of their towns, or the operations of the Spanish army in the field, he this year made a second journey into Spain, after having communicated his intention to his elder brother Ambrose, the celebrated marquis of Spinola. This nobleman, so justly renowned on account of the military talents which he afterwards displayed, had not yet entered into public life, though he was at this time about thirty years of age. But his ambition was now roused by his brother's success, and being conscious of great abilities, he resolved henceforth to avail himself of his fortune, which was one of the greatest in Genoa, in order to render himself illustrious.

Having, from the information communicated to him by his brother, conceived an opinion that the war in the Netherlands might be successfully carried on at sea, he empowered his brother to propose to the court of Spain that, in case they would grant an augmentation of the number of their galleys at Sluys, he would raise at his own expense a body of eight thousand troops, to be commanded by himself, and to serve occasionally on board his brother's fleet.

The Spanish minister readily consented to this proposal, and gave the marquis a commission for levying the troops, while orders were at the same time issued for the equipment of the galleys. The marquis, with the assistance of his numerous friends, and of the count de Fuentes, governor

1602. agreement, and, as above related, arrived with his troops in the Netherlands at a fortunate juncture, when, without his aid, the admiral of Aragon must have abandoned the province of Brabant to the army of the United Provinces.

His brother was not so fortunate in conducting from Spain the gallies with which the king had furnished him. They were eight in number, with above a thousand soldiers on board, and fifteen hundred slaves, who served as rowers. But two of these gallies were, before their departure, burnt by some English ships of war on the coast of Portugal; and other three, having been intercepted by an English and Dutch squadron, which lay in wait for them in the narrow seas, and either taken or destroyed, Frederic arrived in Flanders only with the remaining three.

He was deeply affected by this disaster. His force, which he had been at so great pains in soliciting, was still too small for carrying the designs which he had formed into execution, and for several months he could not engage in any memorable enterprise. But, having become impatient under this inactivity which necessity imposed on him, he ventured with eight gallies, having a great number of soldiers on board, and some frigates, to attack a squadron of Dutch ships of war, which had for some time been stationed on the coast. The contest was bloody and obstinate on both sides; but as the Dutch were favored by the wind, and could navigate their ships with greater dexterity, they were enabled enabled to avoid grappling with the Spaniards, and had thus a much smaller number killed. At length Frederic himself received a mortal wound, of which he died soon after, and his fleet, disheartened by this calamity, and perceiving that their utmost efforts to come to close fight were ineffectual, retired into the canal of Sluys *. BOOK

May, 1603;

The marquis of Spinola was at this time employed in raising troops in Italy, and still entertained the hopes of being able to carry his first design into execution; but his brother's death, joined to the weakness of the Spanish fleet at Sluys, obliging him to abandon it, he now resolved to turn his attention from the sea to the land-service, and with this intention he returned to the Netherlands, where the archduke was disposed to give him every mark of esteem and confidence.

This prince had never before stood so much in need of the counsel and assistance of his friends. The promises of money made him by the court of Spain had been only in part fulfilled, and the mutinous spirit of his troops, occasioned by his inability to pay their arrears, had risen to the greatest height.

They had no sooner retreated after their repulse in attempting to raise the siege of Grave, than almost all the Italians, except those who were commanded by the marquis of Spinola, refused to obey the order which the admiral of Arragon had issued for their marching towards Maestricht, and withdrew themselves in a body from the

 11. men conducted towards Hochstrate, a fortified
 1603. town in Brabant, of which, as they came upon the garrison by surprise, they easily acquired possession. Their number having been augmented by other mutineers, who flocked to them from every quarter, soon amounted to three thousand foot and two thousand horse, and almost the whole of them were veteran soldiers, distinguished for their knowledge of military discipline. Having chosen an elect, or leader, and filled up from among themselves the places of all such officers as had not joined in the mutiny, they established, with general consent, a system of regulations which they judged necessary for their safety and preservation, after which they applied themselves to strengthen the fortifications of the town, and then sent out parties to lay the inhabitants of the adjacent country under contributions. Emboldened by their numbers, they made incursions into the interior and more distant parts of the province, and when the people refused to comply with their exorbitant demands, they laid waste the country, and indulged themselves in every species of injury and outrage. This populous and fertile province had long been exposed to the inroads of the troops of the United States; but they had never been treated with so great cruelty by the enemy as on this occasion, by the troops which had been hired for their defence.

The archduke having convened the states to deliberate concerning a proper remedy for these disorders, he was urged by that assembly to employ whatever money could be raised to give the soldiers immediate satisfaction with regard to their arrears, because without this they represented the country must be involved in utter ruin.

1602.

But Albert, conscious that he had not funds sufficient at once to satisfy the mutineers, and to pay the arrears due to his other troops; and judging, from past experience, that unless he could satisfy them all, the example of those who had mutinied would be quickly followed by their companions, for this reason he entertained some doubt of the prudence of the advice which the states had given him, and declined complying with it, till he should know the sentiments of the court of Spain.

That court ought to have been sensible of the folly of expecting that discipline could be maintained among troops, especially foreign troops, uninterested in the issue of the war, when their pay was withheld from them. They ought, long before this time, to have perceived the absurdity of keeping an army on foot, which they were unable to support. They ought, on the present occasion, to have resolved to reduce the number of their troops, and to rest satisfied with a defensive war, or, by greater economy at home, to enable themselves to make more liberal remittances to the archduke, or to have put an end to the war, by empowering him to grant to the United

 II. to accept. But, instead of adopting any of these 1603. measures, which prudence and necessity required, they resolved that, for an example to the rest of the army, the mutineers ought to be reduced to obedience by force, and for this end they gave orders for levying several new regiments with the utmost possible expedition. It does not appear that the archduke was dissatisfied with this resolution of the Spanish council, and he instantly applied himself to carry it into execution. More than half a year was spent in raising the troops, and making the other necessary preparations; and during all that time, the people of Brabant were exposed to the violence and depredations of the mutineers. In order to intimidate them Albert published an edict of proscription, in which he declared, if they did not return to their duty in three days after receiving the copy of the edict which he sent them, they should be considered as rebels to his government, and be all put to the sword without mercy. To this edict the mutineers published an answer, expressed in the most contemptuous terms. They were more than ever exasperated, and they resolved that, rather than submit to a prince, by whom they thought their services were so ungratefully requited, they would enter into the service of the United States, and make him feel the weight of their resentment.

January 2. Agreeably to this resolution they sent a depu-1604. tation of their number to prince Maurice, to inquire whether, in case they were attacked by the archduke's forces, he would afford them his protection. Maurice, conformably to his conduct on a former occasion, gave them the most gracious reception, and agreed that, in case they should be obliged to abandon Hochstrate, they might retire with safety under the walls of Breda, Bergen op Zoom, or Swenberg. He likewise permitted them to purchase provisions in these towns, and left them ground to hope that, if Albert should not be induced to treat them with greater lenity, he would exert himself to the utmost in their behalf.

The United States considered this mutiny as the most fortunate event that could have happened, because it would greatly retard the archduke's operations in the siege of Ostend, and prevent him from engaging in any new enterprise during the present campaign. They highly approved therefore of the prince's conduct with regard to the mutineers, and empowered him to enter into a formal treaty with them, of which the following were the principal conditions; that, in return for his assistance against the Spaniards, they would serve in his army for the rest of the campaign; and farther, that in the case of an accommodation with the archduke, they would not carry arms for four months against the United Provinces. The states believed that this treaty could not expose them to the imputation of acting ungenerously towards an enemy, whose whole conduct in the war they regarded as tyrannical and unjust; and they thought themselves justified for fomenting the mutiny, by the practice of most nations,

BOOK and particularly of the Spaniards themselves, who II. on all occasions encouraged desertion from the 1603. arms of their enemy.

The archduke was greatly alarmed when he received intelligence of this transaction, and, being at the same time more than ever incensed against the mutineers, he collected his troops with the greatest expedition which the state of his affairs would permit, and sent them, under the command of Frederic, count of Berg, to lay siege to Hochstrate. These troops amounted to seven thousand foot, and three thousand horse; and, as Hochstrate was but indifferently fortified, he must have soon compelled the mutineers to lay down their arms; but prince Maurice, already prepared to fulfil his agreement with the mutineers, advanced towards him with a superior army, which he had assembled at Gertrudenburg, and before the count had time to make any progress in the siege, obliged him to retire into the interior parts of the province.

July 10.

Maurice followed him for some time, but finding it impossible to overtake him, without entering too far into the enemy's country, he suddenly returned and laid siege to Bois le Duc. He had lately given the mutineers a proof of the trust which he reposed in them, by entering their camp with only seven or eight of his attendants; and, on the present occasion, he gave them a farther proof of confidence, by employing them equally with his own troops in the operations of the siege.

The archduke, extremely anxious for the preservation of Bois le Duc, which he considered as one of the most important frontier towns, sent a reinforcement of troops to the count of Berg, and ordered him to march without delay to its relief. The count's army was now nearly equal to that of the enemy, and he arrived in time to seize an important station adjacent to the town, which prince Maurice had not found leisure to secure. From this station he could easily introduce whatever reinforcements or supplies were necessary. But the inhabitants, having hitherto successfully defended the place without the assistance of the Spaniards, were utterly averse to the admission of regular forces. The count labored to persuade them that their preservation entirely depended on admitting them, but they refused to listen to his request; and prince Maurice still entertained the hopes of being able to bring the siege to the desired conclusion.

At length the archduke, having come himself to Bois le Duc, endeavoured, but in vain, to overcome the obstinacy of the citizens, till having obtained their permission to suffer a body of Walloons to pass through the town, under the pretext of their being necessary to oppose the enemy on the other side, he called them together, while the Walloons were within the walls, and once more represented to them the necessity of yielding to his desire, if they meant to preserve their religion and their liberty. They remained still as averse as ever to his proposal; but believing that, while

The two armies continued for ſome time longer in fight of each other, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes paſt between them with various ſucceſs. At length prince Maurice deſpairing, on account of the approach of winter, to bring the ſiege to the deſired iſſue, abandoned his intrenchments, and retired in good order to ſome diſtance from the town. There he remained a whole day, in expectation that the enemy might now be induced to riſk a battle; but being informed, that ſo far from intending this, they had, as ſoon as he left his intrenchments, directed their march towards the interior parts of the province, he broke up his camp, and put his troops into winter-quarters.

To the mutineers, who repreſented to him that Hochſtrate was too ſmall for their accommodation, he aſſigned the town of Grave, of which he himſelf was lord paramount, retaining the citadel in his own hands, and requiring that Hochſtrate ſhould be put into his poſſeſſion. He likewiſe entered on this occaſion into a new agreement with them; the conditions of which they continued religiously to fulfil till the following year, when the archduke, ſtanding much in need of their aſſiſtance, and dreading that many of his other troops were about to join them, found it necessary to grant them an act of indemnity for all past offences, together with full and immediate payment of their arrears¹.

In the course of the transactions related in this book an important event happened, in which both the contending powers were equally interested, the death of Elizabeth, queen of England. This great princess, whose reign was so long and prosperous, had through her whole life enjoyed uninterrupted health, which she had been careful to preserve by regular exercise, and the strictest temperance. But towards the end of the preceding year, having been seized with a cold, which confined her for several days, she found her strength considerably impaired; and, in the hopes of deriving benefit from a change of air, she removed from Westminster to Richmond; but there she grew daily worse, could neither sleep nor eat as usual, and though her pulse was regular, she complained of a burning heat in her stomach, and a perpetual thirst. Both her looks and spirits had from the beginning been greatly affected; business of every kind had become an intolerable burden to her; and at length she sunk into a deep melancholy, expressing the anguish of her mind by tears and groans, and obstinately refusing nourishment, as well as all the medicines which the physicians prescribed for her recovery. This melancholy might have entirely proceeded from her bodily indisposition, although, from some late discoveries, there

But to whatever cause her dejection of mind was owing, it preyed upon her exhausted frame, and in a few weeks put a period to her life, in the seventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign.

It is not surprising that we meet with such contradictory descriptions of the character of this princess in the cotemporary historians, whose passions were too much inflamed to suffer them to judge impartially of her character: but it should seem impossible for any person, who is not blinded by prejudice, to refuse her a place among the most illustrious princes of whom we read either in ancient or in modern times.

She was not indeed exempt from the imperfections that are incident to humanity, and she was subject to several of those weaknesses which characterize her sex. She cannot be vindicated from the imputation of female vanity, and the love of admiration on account of her exterior accomplishments. We should have loved her more if she had been more gentle and indulgent, less imperious and violent, or more candid and sincere. From natural temper, her passions of every kind were strong and vehement, and, among her courtiers, they sometimes betrayed her into improprieties; but they were almost never permitted to influence her public conduct, which was uniformly regulated by the principles of prudence, and a regard for the public good; even her ambition was controlled and governed by these principles, of which she gave a rare and signal proof, when she refused to accept of the sovereignty of the United Provinces. Her penetration and sagacity, her prudence and foresight, her intrepidity in the midst of danger, her activity and vigor, her steadiness and perseverance, and her wise economy, which prompted her to save every unnecessary expence, however small, while it permitted and enabled her to undergo the greatest, when necessity required; these qualities in her character, which are acknowledged by her enemies, as well as her admirers, no prince, of whom we read in history, appears to have possessed in a more eminent degree.

Few princes have been placed in so difficult circumstances, or have had so many, and such formidable enemies to oppose; yet almost no prince ever enjoyed a reign so long and prosperous. While the neighbouring nations were almost continually involved in the calamities of war, she was able, notwithstanding the unremitted attempts of her foreign enemies, and her popish subjects, to preserve her dominions in almost uninterrupted peace. Nor did her own subjects only reap the fruits of her great abilities, but her friends were every where supported and protected by her power; while her enemies, though possessed of much greater resources, were either checked and restrained, or humbled and overcome: without her judicious interposition, the reformation in Scotland must have been extinguished; a race of popish princes must have inherited the crown of that kingdom; and the difference of religion there, and in England, joined to the hereditary right of the Scottish princes to the English throne, whilst it must have proved a copious source of discord, would long have prevented the union of two nations, which must have often been unhappy while they remained, divided and were, by nature, destined to be one. Nor were the benefits which mankind derived from her wise and active reign confined to Britain; but it is likewise probable, that without her aid and her exertions, the protestants in France must have been extirpated; the best and greatest of the French monarchs must have been excluded from the throne; France itself must have sunk under the Spanish yoke; the republic of the United Provinces must have been crushed in its infancy; and an overgrown and enormous power established, which must have overwhelmed the liberties of Europe, and prolonged the reign of ignorance, bigotry, and superstition.

Her death gave equal sorrow to the Dutch as it afforded joy to the archdukes and the court of Spain. The former were thereby deprived of a powerful friend, who had often supported them in the time of their distress; whereas the latter were delivered from a determined enemy, by whom they had been long controlled in all their enterprises.

The affliction of the former was the more sincere, because they had ground to suspect that Elizabeth's successor had not the same favorable sentiments of their cause, nor the same affection for their republic, as the queen had entertained. James, though of a gentle and indulgent temper, averse to the exercise of despotic power, had conceived the most extravagant notions of the measure of obedience due from subjects to their prince; and, being naturally open and unreserved, had, on some occasions, condemned the conduct of the United States, and given them the name of rebels to their rightful sovereign. The court of Spain, desirous to conciliate his favor, had before the death of Elizabeth, made him an offer of their assistance to vindicate his right to the English crown, in case he should meet with opposition. Intelligence of the queen's death had no sooner reached the Netherlands than the archduke, considering the war with England as at an end, had issued a proclamation, forbidding all hostilities against the subjects of the king of England, and ordering all the Scotch and English prisoners to be set at liberty*. The like orders were issued by the court of Spain. And, in return to these advances, James, by proclamation, recalled the letters of marque which had been granted against the Spaniards by Elizabeth.

From these concurring circumstances, the states perceived how little ground they had to hope for the friendship of the English monarch. They

Ambassadors These ambassadors, on their arrival in London, from Holland, found that the suspicions which the states had en-France, and tertained of the king's prejudice against them, were Spain, to the but too well founded. James still continued to king of Great employ the same disrespectful language, when he Britain. spoke of their republic as formerly; nor could they at first obtain an audience. After some delay, they were at length admitted into his presence, through the persuasion of his English counsellors. But though Barnevelt exerted all his eloquence, which he possessed in so eminent a degree, to make him sensible of the danger to which Britain would be exposed, if, by withholding his assistance, he should suffer the United Provinces to fall back again under the dominion of Spain, he could only draw from him a general and vague reply: "That he had not, at present, leisure to consider fully of the subject which had been proposed to his consideration, and would not, therefore, now declare what resolution he should form; but he was himself desirous to live at peace with them, and all his neighbours; and, in case they would imitate his example, he would cheerfully employ his good offices to procure them peace with Spain, upon reasonable terms."

It sufficiently appeared from this reply, that the plan of conduct which the king had formed, was extremely different from that which had been pursued by his predecessor; and the ambassadors would have immediately returned home, in despair of being able to interest him in their behalf, had not they been in daily expectation of the arrival of the French ambassador; through whose intercession they hoped that James might be induced to lend a more favorable ear to their request.

Henry had appointed for his ambassador to England, on this occasion, the marquis of Rosni^{*}, whom, on account of his superior talents and fidelity, he esteemed the most of all his ministers. No subject had ever performed more important services to his prince; and Henry could not, without great inconvenience, spare a minister so necessary to him in the administration of his kingdom. But from various reports, which were propagated at this time, he had conceived a suspicion that James might be persuaded to enter into an alliance with the court of Spain, and no person he believed was more likely to engage him to alter his intention than Rosni, whom he highly respected on account of his inviolable attachment to the protestant religion, and used to celebrate as the greatest statesman in Europe.

James was highly pleased with Henry's choice of his ambassador, and received him with more than ordinary marks of distinction and regard. It had been reported to him by some of the partisans of Spain, that Henry, and even Rosni himself, had spoken disrespectfully of his character^{*}; and James so far descended from his dignity as to mention what he had heard to the marquis; but the impression which it had made upon him was easily effaced; and Rosni, from his first audience, conceived the hopes of being able to accomplish the object of his embassy.

A party among the English ministers were, not without reason, suspected to be attached to the interests of Spain, and others, dreading the difficulties which they must encounter in providing funds for carrying on the war, were averse to all engagements either to France or the states general. From these men, the proposals of the French monarch met with considerable opposition. But the ambassador, having been admitted by the king to a private audience, and having explained to him at full length his master's views, which he showed were all calculated to promote the general interest of Europe, and the security of the protestant religion, whereas the court of Spain were daily giving fresh proofs of the most inordinate and turbulent ambition; he had the address to convince him, that a regard to the safety of his dominions, as well as the interest of his religion, required required that he should join himself with France, and resolve to support the United Provinces. A treaty of alliance to this purpose, was accordingly drawn up, and soon after signed and ratified; of which the following were the principal articles.

That the two kings should mutually contribute their assistance to prevent the Dutch from being overpowered by the Spaniards; that, for this purpose, a sufficient number of troops should be levied within the dominions of the king of England, and sent from thence to the Netherlands as soon as possible; that the whole expense of these troops should be defrayed by the king of France, but that the half^{*} of what he advanced, should be deducted from the debt which he owed to Elizabeth. It was resolved, that in order to avoid an open rupture with the court of Spain the utmost secrecy should be observed in levying the troops, and in transporting them to the continent; but it was agreed, that in case these transactions could not be concealed, and the Spaniards, in revenge for the assistance afforded to the Dutch, should attack either, or both of the contracting princes, they should mutually assist each other, and furnish such a number of troops, to be employed by sea or land, as should be judged sufficient for their mutual defence, and the preservation of the United Provinces¹⁰.

James immediately fulfilled his part of this agreement, by giving secret orders to the lord Buccleugh to raise a body of two thousand men in Scotland; who, some months after, were sent over to join the army of the states¹¹.

The archdukes and the court of Spain were greatly alarmed, when they heard of the kind reception which the king had given to the French ambassador, and they suspected that some treaty had been concluded between them. It does not, however, appear that they received particular intelligence of the purport of it; and they still entertained the hopes of being able to fix James in their interest.

The archdukes had early sent over the count d'Aremberg, as their ambassador, to congratulate him on his accession; and soon after Don John de Taxis, count of Villa Mediana, arrived in the same capacity from Spain. It was commonly believed that the former of these noblemen, who was esteemed as a soldier, but was extremely ill qualified for his present employment, had, soon after his arrival in England, given his countenance to a conspiracy, formed by the lords Grey, Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others, for subverting the present government, and raising Arabella Stuart to the throne. It should seem that he had, at least, lent an ear to the conspirators, without thinking it incumbent on him to communicate their intention to the king's ministers; and by this imprudent conduct he rendered himself so obnoxious to James, that, in his hands, no treaty of agreement with his master could have succeeded. But James was still as much as ever bent on peace with Spain, nor had he meant to preclude himself from concluding it by his treaty of alliance with the French monarch.

Taxis left no art untried to confirm him in this pacific disposition; and, at the same time, labored to remove those prejudices against the Spaniards which he had long entertained, and had been lately awakened by count d'Aremberg's concern in the conspiracy. He was warmly seconded by the queen, who, being attached to the Spanish interest, had conceived the desire of having the young prince, her son, married to the infanta; and, by bribes and promises, it was believed, he had gained over a considerable party of the English counsellors.

The French king and the states general, thought they had much reason to dread the influence of such powerful agents, and they employed all their interest to counteract them, and to divert the king from his intention. James gave them repeated assurances that Henry should have no ground to complain of him for any breach of the alliance into which he had so lately entered, nor the states for being inattentive to their interest; but the present situation of his affairs, he told them, rendered it necessary for him to put an end to the Spanish war.

B O O K

He accordingly gave orders to his ministers for holding conferences for this purpose, with the Spanish and Flemish ambassadors, and in the mean time caused an entire stop to be put to all hostilities.

Those appointed by the archdukes were d'Aremberg, and Richard of Verreicken; and Rouda, a senator of Milan, had come over to the assistance of Taxis.

The letter which Taxis brought to James from the king of Spain was addressed to him not in the usual style, To our Brother, but to our Cousin; and, in enumerating James's titles, though France was mentioned, Ireland was omitted. James laughed at the latter of these absurdities, into which he supposed the Spanish court had been led, by their complaisance to the pope, who had published a bull, declaring Ireland to be a fief of the holy-see; but he sharply expressed his resentment at the term Cousin.

It soon appeared that the claims of the two nations on each other, were but few in number. No conquests had been made by either of the two parties, which the other could insist to have restored; and neither of them claimed an indemnification for the expenses of the war; but there were two points which were difficult to be adjusted, and occasioned the holding of many conferences. The Spaniards, on the one hand, insisted that James should engage to prevent his subjects from entering for the future into the service of the United States; and he, on the other, required that they should enjoy the liberty of trade to the Indies. BOOK

The Spanish ambassador represented, that his master had expected to find in his Britannic majesty, a good and faithful ally; and hoped to have formed an offensive and defensive alliance with him, but if he was still determined, in imitation of his predecessor, to give assistance to the rebels in the Netherlands, it was impossible but the catholic king must consider him rather as an enemy than a friend. The English commissioners replied, that their master could not now regard the Dutch in the light of rebels; their sovereignty had been acknowledged by some of the greatest princes in Europe, and the king had, on his accession, found so close a connexion subsisting between them and his English subjects as could not be dissolved without considerable prejudice to his kingdom: he was therefore resolved to permit them to make levies within his dominions as formerly; but as he intended to observe a strict neutrality, he was ready to grant the same permission to the archdukes and the king of Spain, and farther to engage that he should not send any of his own troops to the assistance of the states, nor furnish them either with money or with military stores. The Spanish commissioners finding, after several conferences, that all their remonstrances on this head proved ineffectual, were obliged to acquiesce in the king's proposal.

The other article above mentioned, which related to the India trade, was the subject of several conferences, and of great altercation between the commissioners. The Spaniards maintained that, as they were the first discoverers of the Indies, and their right to these countries had been confirmed by the sovereign pontiff, no other nation was entitled to trade there without their permission; that for weighty reasons they had refused to grant this permission; not only to the king of France in the treaty of Vervins, but likewise to the emperor, and to the archdukes; that these reasons still subsisted, and therefore they must not only decline granting it to the English, but insist that the king of England shall, by proclamation, prohibit all his subjects from continuing to trade in India, as they had done for some years past.

This chimerical pretension was treated by the English commissioners with the contempt which it merited; the Spaniards themselves had traded to many parts of India, besides those where they had established their dominion; and no reason could be given why the English should not enjoy the same liberty. James peremptorily refused to publish the prohibition which was requested of him. His subjects had for many years been in possession of the India trade, and he resolved that they should not be deprived of it by any article in the present treaty.

The disputes on this subject rose to so great a height as to give ground to apprehend that the conferences would have proved abortive; but, as both parties were eagerly bent on peace, it was at length proposed that no mention whatever should be made of the Indies in the treaty, and to this proposal they both yielded their consent.

All the other articles were easily adjusted; but as Taxis had not plenipotentiary powers, the signing of it was delayed for some time longer. This, however, had been reserved for Don John de Velasco, duke of Frias, and constable of Castile, who, several months before had come to Brussels, in his way to England: but had remained till now in Flanders, either on account of his health, which was the excuse he offered for his delay, or, as was suspected by the English, because he judged it to be incompatible with his dignity to come over to England till he knew that peace would certainly be concluded. He had requested the English monarch to send his commissioners to treat with him in the Netherlands; but James declined complying with this request, because the catholic king, he said, had first offered to send his ambassador to England, and he chose to have the treaty carried on under his own eye ¹².

Velasco arrived at Dover on the 5th of August, and was from thence conducted by some English noblemen sent to receive him, with great pomp to London. The treaty was signed on the 19th of August, and next day was ratified by the king ¹³. The publication of it gave general satis-

During the course of these negotiations, the war in the Netherlands was carried on with more than ordinary vigor. The siege of Ostend had lasted for more than two years and a half, and the besiegers, during all that time, had exerted their utmost strength and skill, yet so vigorous was the opposition which they received from the garrison, that they had not been able to make any considerable impression on the place. Those huge machines, above-mentioned, which were intended for blocking up the canal, were no sooner brought within reach of the artillery of the town, than, by the well-directed shot of the besiegers, they were either demolished or set on fire. The besieged too made innumerable sallies, in which they displayed the most determined intrepidity, and completed the destruction of such parts of the Spanish works as could not be reached by the artillery.

The principal engineer employed in constructing these works was Pompeo Targone, an Italian, who possessed an inventive genius, but had never till now enjoyed an opportunity of reducing his theories to practice. Of this man's ingenuity the archduke unfortunately entertained too favorable an opinion, and was thus too easily induced to approve of projects, which, on trial, were found impracticable, but were attended in the execution with immense expense. His machines were all constructed at some distance from the town, but when they were brought forward to the places where they were to be used, they were exposed, either to the violence of the tide, or to the fire of the besiegers; and it often happened that works were in a few hours destroyed, or rendered useless, on which the labor of many weeks had been employed.

The archduke came at length to be undeceived in the expectations which he had formed of the success of these works. His patience was now greatly exhausted; and he began to suspect that the repeated disappointments which he had met with must be in a great measure owing to the want of skill or vigor on the part of those to whom he had committed the conduct of the siege.

The marquis of Spinola had been only a few months in the Netherlands, and, till his arrival there, had never witnessed any military operations; yet Albert, with the consent of the court of Spain, resolved to devolve on him the command of the army, and the prosecution of this siege, in which the strenuous efforts of his most experienced commanders had been of so little avail. In forming this resolution it was generally believed that, in the issue, he would find he had been betrayed into still greater imprudence than when he reposed such undeserved confidence in the abilities

Spinola was highly pleased, with so flattering a distinction, but could not avoid feeling much anxiety when the archduke communicated to him his intention. He hesitated for some time whether to accept, at so critical a juncture, of so important a command, in which, instead of acquiring fame, he might, at his very entrance upon the military life, expose himself to so great a risk of incurring censure and reproach: and therefore, before he agreed to the archduke's proposal, he convened together such of the officers as he confided in, and desired them deliberately to consider whether it was practicable to bring the siege of Ostend to the desired conclusion.

These men differed widely from each other in their sentiments on the subject, and only contributed to increase his perplexity. But, being conscious of resources within himself, of which those who attempted to dissuade him could form no conception, his hopes and his ambition at length prevailed over his doubts and fears, and determined him to accept of the command.

The failure of many enterprifes, he believed, had been greatly owing to the mutinous spirit of the troops, occasioned by the irregularity of their pay; and to remedy this evil was the first object to which he applied his attention. Upon inquiry, he found that large sums of money had been misapplied, or embezzled by those who had the care of the military chest. These persons he dismissed from their employments, and substituted others, upon a plan of greater economy, in their room. But he still perceived that the military funds were too small to enable him to keep the troops in good humor, and at the same time to carry on successfully all the expensive operations of the siege. Of the truth of this he spared no pains to convince the archduke and the Spanish ministers; and, in the mean time, till they should devise expedients for furnishing him with more ample supplies, he pledged his private fortune for such considerable sums, as put it in his power to give instant satisfaction to the troops.

In conducting the operations of the siege, his deference for the judgment of the archduke determined him to persist for some time longer in the attempt, which had cost so much expense of blood and labor, to intercept the navigation of the canal; and, in order to form the intended dike, and batteries on the banks of it, great quantities of stones and earth and other materials were brought from a distance, on floats or rafts constructed by Targone. But this work, being exposed both to the fire and the sallies of the besieged, advanced

1604. slowly. It could not be finished, he perceived, for many months; and, even when it should be finished, though it would render the navigation of the canal more difficult to the Dutch ships, yet many of them, he foresaw, by taking advantage of the night, and winds and tides, might elude his batteries, and the garrison still continue to receive supplies. In order to prevent this, Targone had, with the archduke's approbation, begun to erect, on large boats strongly bound together, a huge floating castle, which he proposed to station in the mouth of the canal, and to plant it with cannon. But Spinola considered this project as chimerical. A pile so huge and unwieldy could not, he suspected, be brought from the place where the engineer was employed in building it to the mouth of the canal; although it should be found practicable to do this, yet the machine would not long resist the violence of the tide; and, unless a dike of an extraordinary height and strength could be raised to shelter it, it would soon be demolished by the artillery of the town.

Determined by these motives, Spinola abandoned the design of blocking up the canal, and resolved, henceforth, to employ his whole strength in carrying on the siege by mines, batteries, and assaults. The archduke, notwithstanding the repulse which he had met with in the assault above-related, would, on the second day after, have resumed his attempt, if the troops, discontented with his treatment of them on that occasion, had not refused to obey. But the whole army was now under the most perfect discipline, and having no longer any ground to complain of their want of pay, they were ready to give every proof of their attachment to their general, from whom they had received so much greater attention than had formerly been shown them. Encouraged by this disposition of his army, Spinola issued his orders for a general assault, in the same quarter where the former one had failed, at the small canal which encompassed the fortifications on the west. In order to inspire his troops with emulation, he divided them into four battalions, one of which was entirely composed of Germans, the second of Spaniards, the third of Italians, and the fourth of Walloons, and other foldiers raised in the county of Burgundy. Great quantities of materials had been provided for forming dikes across the canal, at those parts where he intended the troops should pass; and the foremost ranks were ordered to carry before them a sort of rampart formed of twigs and faggots, to screen them from the fire of the enemy's small arms in their approach.

The garrison, having received intelligence of his design, were well prepared for their defence; and the assailants had no sooner entered the canal than they began a dreadful fire upon them, both with their small arms and their artillery. Great numbers fell, notwithstanding the precautions which had been taken: still, however, they continued to advance. The Walloons having been stationed farthest from the sea, where the canal was of the smallest depth, were the first who arrived on the other side, and the rest of the army quickly followed. The garrison still maintained their ground, and kept up an incessant fire, by which the bravest of the assailants fell in heaps above one another. Spinola was in the midst of his troops, giving orders, and exhorting them to persevere. They were animated by his example, as well as his exhortations, and it being now become more dangerous to retreat than to advance, they hastened forward with the most desperate intrepidity, and attacked the ravelins and halfmoons which defended the counterscarp. The garrison withstood their fury for some time; but at length, after great numbers had fallen on both sides, they were compelled to abandon their outworks, and retire within the ditch.

Spinola could not at this time attempt with safety to proceed any farther in the attack; but, having covered his men from the enemy's fire, he immediately began, by working trenches, to make still nearer approaches to the place¹⁵.

The states general were in the mean time deliberating whether to attempt to raise the siege, by marching the army to Ostend; or to undertake some new conquest on the coast of Flanders, by which the loss of Ostend, which they had now more reason to dread than ever, might be compensated. After mature deliberation, the latter of these measures was adopted, as the easiest to be carried into execution; and it was agreed to undertake the reduction of Sluys¹⁶, which, as it lay nearer to the United Provinces, would prove in every respect a more valuable possession than Ostend.

The troops were ordered to rendezvous at Williamstadt, where prince Maurice, attended by the deputies of the states, arrived on the 24th of April, and next day he set sail with upwards of twelve thousand men for the isle of Cadfant, which is separated from Sluys by the great canal. Having disembarked without opposition, he soon reduced all the forts upon the island. From Cadfant he passed over into that part of Flanders which lies to the eastward of Sluys, and laid siege to a strong fort called St. Catherine. The garrison of this fort, having made a more vigorous resistance than he expected, he resolved, rather than be detained before it any longer, to leave it behind him in the enemy's possession, and gave orders for having his artillery drawn off in the middle of the night; but one of his cannon having sunk in a marsh, a great number of sailors were employed in raising it, who made so great a bustle and noise, that the garrison, believing the whole Dutch army to be at hand, and that they were removing their artillery to a more advantageous situation, in order to renew the attack, were seized with a panic, and fled precipitately towards Isendyck. Of this unexpected event the prince received intelligence next morning, when he took possession of the fort: and from thence he proceeded to Isendyck, Ardenburgh, and other places, all of which he easily compelled to surrender.

In the mean time Spinola, having been informed by Serrano, the governor of Sluys, of the danger which threatened him, sent him a reinforcement of three hundred men. With this reinforcement, joined to as great a number of the garrison as could be spared, Serrano, who was an officer distinguished for his activity and enterprize, resolved to embrace the opportunity which the present distance of prince Maurice's army afforded him, to make an attack on the isle of Cadfant.

Had his design succeeded, he must have got possession of all the Dutch transports, together with their military stores, and thus have rendered it impracticable for Maurice to proceed in his intended enterprize against Sluys. Some companies of Scots troops, which had been stationed in Cadfant, having no apprehension of danger, were off their guard, and Serrano had time to land six hundred of his men without opposition; but the Scots, having soon received intelligence of their landing, set out instantly to oppose them, and having come upon them, before they were completely formed, attacked them with uncommon fury, and drove them back in great confusion to their boats.

The prince had now subdued all the fortified places which lay to the east of Sluys, and was advancing westward, when he was met by Velasco, general of the archduke's cavalry, who had been sent to obstruct his progress. Velasco had posted his troops in a strong situation, near Dam, which stands on the canal of Bruges. He had the good fortune in the beginning to repulse a party of the Dutch

Dutch horse, who were sent before the rest of the army to attack his intrenchments; but the infantry coming up, he was overpowered by numbers. About eight hundred of his men were killed and taken prisoners, and he himself with the rest was obliged to retire precipitately towards Dam.

After this success Maurice, judging it unnecessary to lose time in laying siege to this fort, proceeded in his march, and, with little difficulty, made himself master of all the forts on the great canal, by which Sluys communicates with the sea; immediately after which he assigned their several stations to his troops in the neighbourhood of the town; and began to form a line of circumvallation round the place, by working deep intrenchments, where the soil permitted, casting bridges over the numberless little canals and rivulets, by which the ground is almost every where intersected, and fortifying the whole at certain distances with redoubts¹⁷.

In these laborious operations, several weeks were employed, and before the works were finished, the archduke found means, at different times, to reinforce the garrison with fifteen hundred men. Prince Maurice was not sorry for the introduction of these troops into the town. He had received certain intelligence that the stock of provisions in

The archduke, on the other hand, expected ere long to be able to raise the siege, and dreaded no danger but from the weakness of the garrison. He was deeply sensible of the great importance of Sluys, which, besides affording the most commodious retreat to the Spanish gallees, was conveniently situated for an invasion of the United Provinces, and enabled him to give great annoyance to their trade. He could not, however, persuade himself to forego the fruits of his long continued labors before Ostend, by raising the siege of that place; but he resolved, for some time, to suspend his operations there, and signified to Spinola, his desire that he should immediately march to the relief of Sluys, leaving no more troops behind him, than were sufficient to restrain the sallies of the garrison.

Spinola, who was well acquainted with the character of prince Maurice, had a just sense of the difficulty of carrying the archduke's design into execution, and remonstrated against it as impracticable; but finding that Albert could not be prevailed on to alter his resolution, he agreed to accept of the command, upon condition that the officers of greatest experience should accompany him in the expedition. He could hardly flatter himself with the hopes of success, and he wished that others should partake in the censure which he was likely to incur. The archduke readily consented to this proposal; and, being joined on this occasion by a great number of the mutineers, who had been persuaded to return to their duty, he began his march with six thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides a train of artillery, and a large convoy of provisions.

The garrison of Sluys had already begun to suffer greatly from the want of wholesome food; and Serrano had repeatedly sent notice, that without a supply, he could not possibly hold out for many days longer. Spinola therefore advanced towards Sluys with the utmost expedition; and, having received intelligence that the weakest part of the enemy's lines was at a village called Tervarde, he made an attack upon them in that quarter, in the middle of the night. But the Dutch troops were prepared for his reception; and though he had taken every precaution to insure success, he was obliged, after repeated attempts, to retire with considerable loss.

He then fetched a compass round by Ardenburgh, and directed his march towards the isle of Cadfant, in the hopes of making himself master of that island, from whence he might by water introduce provisions into Sluys. He expected to have come upon the enemy in surprise, by fording the canal which separates Cadfant from Flanders on the east. But prince Maurice, having suspected his design, had planted a half moon battery there, and stationed some select troops to

II. some advantage, and drew them from the bat-

August. obliged to abandon his attempt, after an obstinate contest, in which he suffered the loss of five hundred killed, and as many wounded.

Had not Spinola entered with reluctance on his present enterprise, his prudence might justly have been impeached; but as his disapprobation of it, and his diffidence of success were known to the enemy by intercepted letters, as it had been known from the beginning to his friends, and nothing had been wanting on his part to carry it into successful execution; it served, notwithstanding his repulse, to heighten his character for military skill, and confirmed the archduke in the high opinion which he entertained of his abilities.

August 19. He returned without delay to Ostend; and, on the second day after his retreat, Serrano, the governor of Sluys, capitulated upon honorable terms. His garrison amounted to four thousand men, besides a great number of slaves, who had formerly been employed on board the galleys; but his stock of provisions had, several days before, been entirely consumed, and the strength of the soldiers was so much impaired, that more than sixty of them died on the road to Dam, which is only two hours march from Sluys.

Fourteen hundred slaves, the greater part of whom were Turks, were set at liberty; and as many of them chose to return to their native country, the United States, in order to conciliate the friendship of the Corsairs, treated them with great humanity while they remained in Holland, and afterwards sent them in Dutch ships to Barbary¹¹.

The glory which prince Maurice acquired from so important a conquest, was greatly heightened by the comparison which men generally instituted between the rapidity of his progress, and the slowness of that of the Spaniards before Ostend. Judicious observers thought there was hardly room for this comparison, the two cases being extremely different in the most important respects from each other; but it was universally acknowledged that Maurice had, on no former occasion, discovered greater vigor and vigilance, or greater military skill.

The archduke, on the other hand, was severely mortified; nor was he entirely free from apprehension of being ere long subjected to a still greater mortification, as a considerable part of the season fit for action still remained, and he expected that Maurice, whose army had suffered almost no diminution, would next attempt to compel

B O O K him to raise the siege of Ostend. In order to
 II. prevent this, which he would have considered as 1604. the greatest calamity that could befall him, he gave immediate orders for strengthening the fortifications of Dam, Blackenberg, and other places, by which the prince's army could approach.

But Maurice had no intention of entering so far into an enemy's country, whose forces were superior in number to his own; and the states general, highly satisfied with the success which had already attended their arms, resolved to employ the remainder of the season in securing their new conquests. No expense was spared to render Sluys impregnable, and Cadfant, IJsendvick, and several other places in the neighbourhood of Sluys, were strongly fortified.

The marquis of Spinola had, in the mean time, resumed his operations before Ostend, and was daily making nearer approaches to the town. He had already crossed the ditch, and compelled the garrison to retire from all that part of the place called the old town, but one redoubt¹⁹, from which, as it was considerably elevated above the other fortifications, the besieged made dreadful havoc among his troops. He resolved, whatever it should cost him, to make himself master of this redoubt. His Spanish and Italian troops, having been again and again repulsed with great slaughter, could not be persuaded to renew the attack: and this arduous undertaking was therefore committed to two regiments of Germans, who allured by promises, and pushed on by emulation to execute what the Italians and Spaniards had abandoned in despair, advanced towards the fort with the most determined intrepidity. The garrison sprung a mine upon the foremost of these regiments, and blew up a great number of them in the air. The rest, however, supported by the second regiment, still continued to advance, and having attacked the garrison sword in hand, they drove them with irresistible fury from the place.

The garrison, by the advice of a Scotch engineer of the name of Dixter, had provided against this disaster, by drawing a strong intrenchment flanked with bastions, and fortified with artillery betwixt the old and the new part of the town; and behind this, they had likewise drawn another intrenchment of the same kind, across the middle of the new town; being determined to dispute every inch of ground, and to maintain their defence till the last extremity.

From the progress, however, which Spinola had already made, and the skill and vigor with which his operations were conducted, it could not be doubted, that he must ere long get possession of the place. The garrison still continued to make the most vigorous sallies upon his miners and his troops; but since they had lost the fort of Sandhill, these sallies were made at a much greater expense of blood, on their part, than formerly: their new works had not yet acquired the same solidity and strength as those from which they had been expelled; and, being now confined within

The states general, influenced by these considerations, and thinking it extremely doubtful whether the preservation of Ostend, since the conquest of Sluys, was an object worthy of the expense and attention it must cost, resolved to persist no longer in the defence, and sent instructions to the sieur de Marquette, the governor, to prepare himself for capitulating upon honorable terms.

On receiving these instructions, Marquette immediately conveyed to Flushing, by the ships which were then lying in the harbour, all deserters, and other persons, who had any particular reasons for dreading the enemy's resentment, together with a part of the artillery and stores; after which he sent two of his principal officers to treat with Spinola of the surrender of the place.

Ostend capitulates.

This general, whether from admiration of that intrepid bravery which the garrison had displayed, or because he was still diffident of success, and desirous to avoid the further effusion of blood, readily agreed that the garrison should march out with all the honors of war, and be safely conducted by land to Sluys; that waggons should be furnished to the sick and wounded; that the inhabitants should be at liberty to quit the town without molestation ; and that all prisoners on both sides should be released. This agreement was made on the 20th of September , in the beginning of the fourth year since the commencement of the siege ; and on the second day after, Spinola was put in possession of the town. He religiously fulfilled all the articles of the capitulation, and while the garrison were preparing to set out , he gave proof of a generosity of spirit , of which no other instance has occurred in the history of the present war , by inviting the governor, and all colonels and captains in the place , to a magnificent entertainment , where he treated them with every mark of distinction and respect.

From Ostend, the governor marched at the head of his garrison , amounting to near four thousand men , with a small train of artillery , along the sea-coast , till they arrived in the neighbourhood of Sluys , where they were met by prince Maurice , who received them in the most gracious manner , and gave them every testimony of applause and gratitude. They were soon after followed by almost the whole body of inhabitants , who chose rather to reside at Sluys than Ostend ; and the chief magistrate of Ostend was appointed chief magistrate of Sluys.

Such was the termination of this celebrated siege , which , besides an enormous expense of labor and military stores , had cost the contending parties the lives of near a hundred thousand men. Ostend could not , on any account , be deemed worthy of this expense ; yet the Dutch

B O O K seemed to have acted wisely in defending it with
II. so great obstinacy. They could, no where else, 1604. have encountered the enemy on more advantageous terms: and, while the siege continued, they not only enjoyed profound tranquillity at home, but were at liberty to secure and extend their frontier, by the acquisition of Rhinberg, Grave, Cadfant, Isendyck and Sluys.

The conduct of the archduke does not admit of any such apology. Hardly any of the places which he had lost was of less importance than Ostend; and Sluys, from its excellent harbour, and its neighbourhood to Zealand, was of much greater importance. His arms, at a juncture, when his finances were low, and his troops mutinous, ought rather to have been employed in defending his own dominions, than in attacking those of the enemy: and if he had found leisure for acting offensively, he ought to have made his attack on some place of easier conquest, in the preservation of which the United Provinces were more deeply interested.

But if he ever came to be sensible of his error, it was not till he thought that it could not be retrieved with honor; and he was encouraged to persist in it by the Spanish ministers, who were at too great a distance from the scene of action to judge of the conduct which it was proper to pursue.

But there was reason now to expect that neither the archduke, nor the court of Spain, would for the future be guilty of the same sort of imprudent conduct, as that into which, on different occasions, they had been hitherto betrayed; as both he and they were impressed with a just esteem of the prudence and great abilities of the marquis of Spinola, and had resolved to devolve on him the entire direction of the war. He had already given striking proofs of superior capacity; and no person doubted that he would still be found deserving of that extraordinary confidence that was reposed in him.

A chief source, Spinola knew, of those disappointments and losses which Albert had sustained, was his irregularity in the pay of his troops, and in order to remedy this evil, the marquis resolved either to reduce their number, or to be well assured of procuring more ample funds for their support. But no sufficient funds could be procured, unless they were furnished by the court of Spain, and therefore, as soon as he put his army into winter-quarters, he set out for Madrid, in the hopes of being able to convince the Spanish ministers of the necessity of either making greater exertions, and furnishing more liberal supplies, or of resolving as soon as possible to put a period to the war.

The Spanish finances were in no better order at this time than at any former period. From that decay of industry, of which the causes have been already mentioned, Spain was no longer able to furnish either her colonies or herself with manufactures of her own production. The gold and silver which she imported from America no precious metals in Spain, had risen to so great a height, that the duke of Lerma had, last year, raised the nominal value of the copper-coin,

 which by a royal edict was made nearly equal to that of silver. But this absurd expedient served only to increase the evil which it was intended to prevent or remedy ²².

Counterfeit copper-money, of equal intrinsic value to the current coin in Spain, was poured into that kingdom by the neighbouring nations;
 these nations, at the same time, received gold and silver in return; they still continued likewise
 to receive the price of their manufactures in gold and silver. And thus was Spain more than ever drained of these precious metals. The distress arising from thence was sensibly felt from one end of the kingdom to the other, and the ministers
 often found it difficult to procure money sufficient for the necessary purposes of government. But, being now delivered from the burden of the war with England, and hoping that henceforth the returns of treasure from America would be greater and more certain than they had hitherto been,
 they resolved, in conformity to the king's inclination, to spare no expense to enable the archduke to carry on the war in the Netherlands with vigor.

The court

 carry on the war.

Agreeably to this resolution, the marquis of Spinola, to whom Philip, on this occasion, gave every proof of esteem and confidence, was immediately furnished with a considerable sum of money. The strongest assurances were likewise given him, by the ministers of greater punctuality in their future remittances; and there was at the same time conferred upon him, full power to employ all the money which he received, or was afterwards to receive, in the manner which he should judge to be most expedient. The conduct of the archduke, it seems, and that of those to whom he had committed the administration of his finances, had rendered this precaution necessary; he had never observed that strict economy which the exigencies of his affairs required; and it would appear, that being sensible of this defect in his character, and conscious of his inability to correct it, he was well pleased to have the disposal of the money sent from Spain, devolved upon Spinola.

The marquis having thus accomplished the design of his journey to Madrid, and obtained from Philip and his ministers their approbation of his plan of operations for the next campaign, returned without delay to Brussels. The first object of his attention was to remove every ground of discontent among his troops, by applying a part of the money which he had brought along with him to the discharge of their arrears; immediately after which, he gave orders for making numerous levies in Germany and in the Southern Provinces

 the governors of Naples and Milan, to provide for him a strong reinforcement of Italians ²¹.

The United Provinces on the other hand, being already well acquainted with the activity and enterprise of Spinola, had strenuously exerted themselves in their military preparations, and were sooner ready to take the field. They had formed the design of laying siege to Antwerp, where they had learnt that the number of the garrison was neither adequate to the extent of the fortifications, or the great importance of the place. Prince Maurice did not approve of this expedition, but engaged in it at the request of the states. Having put a part of his army on board transports, under count Ernest of Nassau, he himself marched over land with the rest from Bergen op Zoom, and joined Ernest, at the fort of Lillo, which stands on the north side of the Scheld, about two leagues distant from Antwerp, and was still in possession of the Dutch.

His intention was to lay all the low grounds between Lillo and Antwerp under water, by cutting the dike of the Scheld, together with the counter-dike at Couvestein, and then to cross over the inundation, and to pitch his camp on the higher grounds which lie near the town. He would thus have had a much smaller space to inclose with his intrenchments, while his army would have been entirely secure on one side against the approach of the enemy. His design had been carefully concealed, and if his transports had not been detained by contrary winds, his enterprize would probably have been attended with success. But Spinola, conjecturing from the embarkation of a part of his forces, and his choice of Bergen for the rendezvous of the rest, that he could not have any other object in view but the siege of Antwerp, had time to take every precaution to prevent him from carrying his plan into execution. He had greatly augmented the garrisons of the town and of the forts upon the counterdike; and at the same time had lined the banks of the Scheld on both sides with a sufficient number of troops to oppose his landing²².

Maurice attempted, however, to make a descent on the Flanders side near Caloo, but finding his utmost efforts ineffectual, and that Spinola was every where upon his guard, he abandoned his first attempt; and after reducing the castle of Woude, a strong fort in the neighbourhood of Bergen, he embarked his army, and made a descent in Flanders, near Isendyck, with an 1605. Maurice himself had disapproved of this expedition, as well as of his attempt on Antwerp, and had advised to employ the army on the banks of the Rhine, where he thought there was reason to dread an irruption of the enemy; but he had yielded to the judgment of the states, who being anxious for the preservation of Sluys, were desirous of getting possession of as many fortified towns as possible, in the neighbourhood of that important place. They had formerly had repeated proofs, how ill qualified they were to judge of the proper conduct of the war; and from the sequel, it will appear, how much wiser it had been, if, on the present occasion, they had listened to the opinion of their general.

Maurice had not time to begin his operations, either against the Sas of Ghent or Hulft, when Spinola, who on this occasion derived great advantage from his bridge over the Scheld, arrived in sight with all his forces: but, as neither of the two generals were inclined to try the fortune of a battle, they immediately applied themselves to fortify their respective camps; resolving, each of them, to await till some favorable opportunity should offer of annoying his enemy, without exposing himself to danger. Several skirmishes were fought by foraging parties, with various success, but neither party was able to gain any considerable advantage over the other.

At

At length, Spinola having effectually provided for the safety of the two places which Maurice had intended to attack, left a part of the army under the count of Berg, to watch his motions, and ordered the rest to direct their march towards Maestricht.

About this time he expected the arrival of the troops which had been raised for the archduke's service in Germany and Italy, and he had appointed Maestricht for the place of rendezvous. Agreeably to the promise given him by the court of Spain, a regiment, consisting of twelve hundred men, had been embarked at Lisbon, in eight ships, which, in order to elude the vigilance of the enemy, had been hired from Hamburgh of the English and Danish merchants. But, notwithstanding their precaution, they were intercepted by the Dutch admiral Houtain, whom the states had ordered to lie in wait for them in the English channel. Four of them were either taken or destroyed, and the remaining four obliged to take shelter in Dover, where they were shut up by the Dutch till the following winter, when the long nights afforded them an opportunity to escape to Flanders²¹.

²¹ The states disgraced themselves, and sullied the victory which they obtained on this occasion, by ordering all the prisoners to be tied, two and two together, and thrown into the sea. Yet neither Grotius nor Van Meteren, the two most respectable of the Dutch historians, have spoken of their conduct as reprehensible. Their pretext for this barbarity, was to damp the courage of the Spaniards, but it rather served to inspire them in all their rencounters with desperate rage and fury: and as no better reason could be given for treating with

plan for conducting the
war.

The marquis of Spinola lamented the loss of the Spanish troops the more, as they were all veteran soldiers, [commanded by officers of great experience. But all the German and Italian forces which he expected, having arrived in safety, he resolved without further delay, to enter upon the execution of the plan of operations, which, in concert with the archduke, he had formed for the remainder of this campaign. It had been his intention, ever since the surrender of Ostend, to establish the theatre of the war beyond the Rhine, in that part of the dominions of the states, where the superiority of their naval force could be of no avail. His army would thus, he thought, be in some measure supported at the enemy's expense; it would be easier for him to suppress the mutinous spirit of his troops, in case it should again appear; and as the states had no dread of an attack in that quarter, he expected to find some of their principal towns unprepared for a defence. His design had been carefully concealed even from the general officers: councils of war had been held, in which the archduke, in order more effectually to prevent a discovery, had sometimes proposed to undertake the siege of Sluys, and sometimes that of Bergen op Zoom, or of Grave, or of Breda; and the different opinions of the officers had, from time to

so great inhumanity the prisoners whom they took at sea, than those who were taken in the siege of towns, or in the field of battle, it was an example calculated to revive that savage method of carrying on the war, which had excited such general horror when it was practised by the duke of Alva and his son.

time, by secret agents, been communicated to the states. B O O K

Prince Maurice, as already mentioned, was almost the only person upon whom these artifices did not produce the desired effect. He could not be persuaded that Spinola, who had given conspicuous proof of superior sagacity, would undertake the reduction of any of these towns, where the army of the states was at hand to interrupt his operations. He suspected that his attack must rather be intended against some more distant place, which could not be so easily relieved; and had therefore proposed to station the troops on the banks of the Rhine, in order to prevent the enemy from entering the Dutch dominions on the eastern frontier²⁴. But the states having, in consequence of the information they had received of the deliberations in the archduke's council of war, rejected this advice, Spinola was now at liberty to carry his design into execution.

Before he left Flanders, he had given orders to the count de Bucquoi, his general of artillery, to secure a convenient passage for his army over the Rhine; and this active officer, after planting batteries on the banks, and thereby clearing the river of some Dutch armed vessels, which were stationed there, had begun to erect two strong forts, one on each side of the Rhine at Keiserwert, a small town in the electorate of Cologne. As soon as these forts were finished, Spinola set out from Maestricht, with all the troops which July.

 II. which were under Bucquoi, and crossed the Rhine 1605. at the passage which had been secured for him, he called a council of war, and, for the first time, communicated to them his design.

The enemy, he told them, had been first led to expect an attack in Flanders, and they now believed that he had formed a design on Rhinberg. But his intention, from the beginning, had been to lay siege to Lingen; and by the reduction of that important place, to open an entrance into Friesland. He was sensible how much it was contrary to the common maxims of war, to leave behind him so strong a place as Rhinberg, but he did not from thence apprehend any danger or inconvenience, since, with the forts which had been erected, he could always command a safe passage over the river; besides that, the success of his enterprise against Lingen, must greatly depend on the celerity with which it should be executed, as prince Maurice would no sooner hear of the danger to which that place was exposed, than he would hasten to its relief. That although Lingen lay at a great distance, and the march must be performed in a neutral country²⁵, in which the troops would not be supported by plunder, yet there was no ground to dread a scarcity of provisions; he had brought a considerable quantity along with him; he had money sufficient to purchase whatever more should be necessary; and, as he was determined to enforce the strictest military discipline, he had received assurances from the towns of Westphalia, that, on that condition, they would chearfully furnish him with supplies. But attention to discipline was indispenfibly necessary, and for this reason, he was resolved that every violation of the rules of it should be punished with the utmost severity and rigor.

What he declared on this occasion to his officers, he afterwards carried into execution. Some of the soldiers having ventured, notwithstanding the peremptory orders which he had issued, to leave their standards, they were instantly seized and put to death. The rest were intimidated by this example, and although a great part of them had long been accustomed to rapine and disobedience under former generals; yet so great is the power of discipline over troops which regularly receive their pay, that almost no army ever marched through a neutral country against which the inhabitants had so little reason to complain. His camp, in consequence of this prudent conduct, was at all times abundantly supplied, and no time was lost in sending out detachments to procure provisions. The inhabitants still retained a bitter remembrance of their sufferings from the Spanish army, under the admiral of Arragon, and were in some measure animated with gratitude to Spinola for the justice and humanity which he displayed.

After traversing a part of the dutchy of Cleves and Westphalia, he first directed his march to Oldenzeel, a fortified town in the province of

B O O K Overijssel, and soon compelled the garrison to capitulate; immediately after which he advanced towards Lingen, which lies at the distance of only one day's march from Oldenzeel, and, without meeting with any opposition, assigned to his troops their several quarters round the town. Prince Maurice, on whom the states general had, as formerly mentioned, bestowed the property of Lingen and its territory, as a reward for his important services, had, at his own expense, made great additions to the fortifications of it. But as the enemy's attention had, for several years, been turned to another quarter, it was defended, at this time, only by the ordinary garrison, amounting to five or six hundred men.

Spinola lays siege to Lingen.

Even with so small a garrison, however, Prince Maurice had expected it might sustain a siege of several weeks; and the governor, an officer of the name of Cobbe, seemed at first determined to defend it till the last extremity. Spinola was therefore obliged to begin the siege in form, and to make his approaches to the place as usual, by working trenches. The garrison had not sufficient numbers to interrupt his operations, and he soon reached the ditch, which was of an extraordinary breadth and depth, and filled with water; nor could the water be drawn off, because the ditch lay considerably lower than the adjacent ground. But at length, his troops got over it, though not without considerable slaughter, by filling it up with earth and fascines, and then begun to work a mine under one of the principal bastions of the town; when the garrison, importuned by the inhabitants, and despairing of being able to defend themselves much longer, capitulated on honorable terms. BOOK

Prince Maurice, in the mean time, had advanced as far as Deventer, the capital of Overijssel, and was employed in preparing for an attempt to raise the siege.

On the first intelligence which he received of the march of the enemy from Maestricht, he had dispatched his brother, Henry Frederic, with four thousand foot, and one thousand horse, to watch their motions; and a few days after, he had set out himself, at the head of another division of his forces. But, having judged it necessary to leave a considerable proportion of them in Flanders to oppose any attempts which the enemy might make in that province, he was obliged to stop for some days at Deventer, till he had collected a sufficient number of troops from the neighbouring towns, to enable him to undertake the relief of Lingen; and before his preparations were complete, a messenger arrived with the news of its surrender. He was highly incensed against the governor and officers, for the feeble defence they had made of a place of so great importance, and threw them all into prison, where they remained for near a twelvemonth, and though they were afterwards set at liberty, they were all of them degraded from their rank.

He had just cause for the resentment which he felt on this occasion, as Spinola, who had thought

B O O K it unnecessary to secure his army by intrenchments, must have raised the siege as soon as the army of the states had approached. He had ground likewise for great anxiety, when he considered the defenceless state of most of the towns in the neighbourhood of Lingen; and particularly that of Bourtaug and Coevorden, by the conquest of which the enemy would have a free course into the provinces of Groningen and Friesland. It was believed, that if Spinola had immediately attacked these places, he might, without great difficulty, have made himself master of them. But having spent some time in strengthening the fortifications of Lingen, he thereby afforded leisure to prince Maurice to provide for their security. He judged it to be of greater importance to preserve what he had already acquired, than to multiply his conquests; and, as Maurice had collected an army in the neighbourhood, nearly equal to his own, he thought that he could not venture any farther into the enemy's country so late in the season, without exposing himself to the greatest risk. Having, therefore, taken every necessary precaution for the safety of Lingen and Oldenzeel, he returned, afterwards to Keyserwert, and repassed the Rhine.

The forts which had been erected there, having given offence to the elector of Cologne, on whose territory they had been raised, the archduke, in order to appease his resentment, had sent orders for demolishing them; which Spinola did accordingly, and then began to build other two, a little farther down the river, at Rorerort in the county of Meurs, which was at that time subject to the Dutch.

While a part of his army was employed in building these forts, so necessary for preserving his communication with his late conquests, he sent the rest, under the count de Bucquoi, to lay siege to Wachtendonc, a town in Guelderland, which stood in a marshy soil, and was deemed one of the strongest towns in that province, but was at this time rendered more accessible than usual by a long continued drought. As the fortifications however were complete, and the garrison numerous²⁶, he had reason to apprehend that the siege must last for several weeks, and that prince Maurice, who had left Overysfel, and was encamped in the neighbourhood of Wesel, would certainly attempt to raise it. He therefore ordered the count de Bucquoi to fortify his camp with strong intrenchments, and having lately received a strong reinforcement of Italians, besides a considerable number of English, Scotch, and Irish Catholics, whom James, agreeably to his treaty of peace with Spain, had permitted the archduke to enlist in his dominions, he took his station near Rorerort, with a resolution to attack prince Maurice's army in the rear, in case he should venture to approach to Wachtendonc.

In distributing their quarters to his troops on the north side of the Rhine, next to the enemy, he committed an error which was likely to have ²⁶ Twelve hundred men.

B O O K been attended with fatal consequences, by stationing his cavalry at the village of Mulleim, on the banks of the Roer, where they were at too great a distance from the infantry to receive immediate support; no intrenchments had been thrown up to secure them against an attack, nor was there any place of shelter near but a fort on the other side of the Roer, opposite to Mulleim, called the castle of Broeck, which was neither strongly fortified nor furnished with a sufficient garrison. Prince Maurice, having got intelligence of their position, resolved to avail himself of the advantage which it afforded him, and instantly set out from his camp at Wesel, with all his cavalry, and a select body of infantry, amounting to two thousand four hundred men. That no time might be unnecessarily lost on the march, the foot soldiers were put into carriages: the cavalry was ordered to hasten forward before the foot, one half of them commanded by Marcellus Baex, an officer of distinguished spirit and intrepidity, and the other half by prince Henry Frederic, who was at that time only twenty years of age, but who had already given conspicuous proofs of superior prudence and capacity. Prince Maurice himself followed as quickly as possible with the infantry, colonel Baex was ordered to cross the Roer, and to endeavour to get possession of the castle of Broeck, in order to intercept the enemy's communication with their camp, while Henry, supported by prince Maurice, was to attack them at Mulleim.

Baex was successful beyond what could justly have been expected in his first assault upon the fort, having expelled the garrison from every part of it but one, which was defended by a small number of men; but he was interrupted in his progress by the accidental arrival of a party of foragers, who attacked him with great vigor, and obliged him to abandon his attempt upon the fort.

In the mean time prince Henry had passed a narrow defile, which the enemy had left unguarded, and was about to begin the attack at Mulleim. It was unfortunately judged proper to defer it for a little time till the infantry should arrive somewhat nearer. At length he gave orders for his troops to advance, and they obeyed at first with great alacrity; but finding that, through the delay in making the attack, the enemy had taken the alarm, and were in a better posture of defence than they had expected, they were seized, though greatly superior in number, with a sudden panic, and, after an irresolute and feeble effort, they turned their backs and fled, till they were met by prince Maurice at the head of the infantry.

Ashamed of their dastardly behaviour, and being severely reproached by the prince, they were persuaded to return. The Spanish cavalry, from whom they had so precipitately fled, far from venturing to pursue, were in great confusion retreating across the Roer, before a small number of the Dutch cavalry that had remained with their commander. Henry was now rejoined by the rest, and being likewise supported by the English and Scotch infantry, under colonel Vere and lord

BOOK Buccleugh, he pursued the enemy to the other
II. side of the river; but there the Spaniards, com-

 general of the cavalry, having recovered their ranks, returned with great resolution to the charge;
 and the Dutch, being again unaccountably struck with terror, gave way before an inferior enemy, and left prince Henry almost alone in the field of battle. He must have been cut to pieces or taken prisoner, but for the seasonable interposition of the British troops, who, being armed with pikes, attacked the Spanish cavalry, and kept them long at bay.

Henry, perceiving himself abandoned by almost all his men, went over with the few that remained with him, and joined the troops under colonel Baex, who had been long engaged in combat with the enemy in another part of the field.
 Soon after this the Spaniards, having received a reinforcement under Velasco, this part of the Dutch cavalry too was intimidated, and the two commanders, with a small number of adherents, were left, surrounded by the enemy; but in the mean time prince Maurice arrived with his vanguard, and having planted some field-pieces on a rising ground, he played them off so successfully upon the Spaniards, that he soon threw them into confusion, and put them to flight with considerable slaughter. He was preparing to pursue them into a wood, where they had taken shelter, when he received intelligence that Spinola himself was approaching with all his forces.

This general had got early information of the attack, and had instantly set out at the head of six hundred men, leaving orders for two thousand more to follow as quickly as possible. In order to intimidate the enemy, by making them believe that his whole army was at hand, he sent forward a great number of drummers on horseback, and as the ground was favorable to this stratagem, it produced the desired effect. Prince Maurice gave immediate orders for sounding a retreat. Spinola pursued, and made considerable slaughter; but his troops were stopt short in their career by colonel Vere, who being supported by the count de Chatillon, with a select body of French infantry, placed his men in an advantageous situation, behind a hedge, and kept up so hot a fire upon the Spaniards, as obliged them to desist from the pursuit.

The loss of men in this action, which lasted for upwards of eight hours, was considerable; and probably not less than five hundred men on either side. Had the Dutch cavalry arrived at Mullein a little earlier, or acquitted themselves after their arrival as they had done on all former occasions, the Spaniards must have been compelled to lay down their arms²⁷. Prince Maurice therefore, who had never before conceived more sanguine hopes of victory, was highly incensed against them for their pusillanimous behaviour, and reproached them in the severest terms. He could no longer confide in their courage for the execution of any important enterprize, and found it necessary to act with the utmost circumspection through the rest of the campaign ²².

In order, however, if possible, to extinguish the memory of this repulse, he soon after made an attack in the middle of the night on the town of Guelders, and he so far succeeded as to demolish one of the outer gates of that place, by fixing a petard in it; but the garrison having taken the alarm, by the bursting of another petard which happened to fall into the ditch, he was repulsed with loss, and obliged to abandon his attempt. His ill success in this, and in his enterprize at Mulleim, made a strong impression on the minds of the garrison of Wachtendonc. They had from the beginning expected that he would come to their relief, and, in the hopes of his being able to raise the siege, they had given him the strongest assurances of their resolution to defend the town to the last extremity; but when they found that, notwithstanding his most vigorous exertions, the enemy still maintained their superiority, their courage failed, their defence became more feeble and irresolute, and, on the twentieth day after the commencement of the siege, they offered to capitulate, though their number still amounted to more than a thousand men. BOOK

From Wachtendonc Spinola ordered the count de Bucquoi to lead his troops against the castle of Cracao, of which the count made himself master in a few days, and obliged the garrison to surrender at discretion. 11.

Had not the season been so far advanced, it is probable, from the great disparity between the contending parties during this campaign, the states must have suffered still greater losses; but it was now the end of November, the rains had begun to fall, and the troops were greatly exhausted with the fatigues which they had undergone. Spinola therefore, after carefully providing for the security of his new conquests, sent his army into winter-quarters, and his example was soon after followed by prince Maurice. This general had at no former period suffered the enemy to gain so great advantages with impunity; yet, on his part, neither prudence and vigilance, nor vigor and activity, were wanting in opposing their designs. Had the states permitted him to follow his own judgment in the conduct of the war, a different plan of operations would have been adopted; Spinola would probably have been prevented from passing the Rhine, and the lapses lost have been preserved. His army was from the beginning much inferior in number to the enemy, yet, if his well concerted attack at Mulleim had not proved abortive, through that unaccountable panic with which his troops were

B O O K seized, the Spanish cavalry would have been
II. cut off, and Spinola obliged to act on the defen-1605. sive through the rest of the campaign.

But while for these reasons it would seem that no blame can justly be imputed to prince Maurice, Spinola was surely well entitled to the applause which he received from his contemporaries; by whom he was henceforth regarded as one of the greatest generals of the age.

Sanguine hopes of the Spaniards.

The Spanish ministers had no reason to repent of the confidence they had reposed in him, when they reflected on the vigor and great abilities he had exerted during this campaign; and their hopes of being able to compel the revolted provinces to lay down their arms were at this time raised to the greatest height. The archduke likewise had conceived the most sanguine expectations of success, and was assiduously employed throughout the winter, in preparing for a vigorous prosecution of the war.

Having removed the seat of it into the enemy's country, his subjects in Brabant and Flanders could, with greater ease than formerly, afford their annual supplies; but these were not alone sufficient to enable him to carry the plan concerted with the general for the next campaign into execution; and, in order to procure from Spain the assistance which was requisite, he judged it necessary that Spinola himself should undertake another journey to Madrid. The Spanish ministers had acquainted him that they were at present involved

involved in the greatest difficulties, occasioned by the loss of some of their ships loaded with treasure, which had foundered in a storm, in their passage from America; but he hoped that, through Spinola's personal influence with the king, which was so great as even to excite the jealousy of his ministers, they might be induced to have recourse to some extraordinary expedient for his relief.

The marquis, who left Brussels about the middle of winter, found, on his arrival at Madrid, that the account transmitted to the archduke, of the exhausted state of Philip's finances, had not been exaggerated. There was hardly money in the exchequer sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of government, and the ministers had no prospect of being able to procure the sums requisite for carrying on the war with vigor, before the season fit for action would be elapsed. Philip could not resolve, in the midst of victory, to abandon a cause in which he was so deeply interested: and Spinola was determined to decline accepting of the command of the forces, unless an adequate fund should be provided for their pay. Many weeks were spent in fruitless endeavours to raise the money which he demanded. At length the ministers offered to mortgage the treasure which was expected to arrive towards the end of the year from America. And the merchants of Cadiz and other places, upon receiving an obligation for their reimbursement from that

Sickness of Spinola.

The marquis did not hesitate in complying with this request; and immediately after receiving bills of exchange for the money, he set out for the Netherlands, by the way of Italy. In that country he was seized with a fever which detained him for several weeks, and prevented him from reaching Brussels till the beginning of June.

Strange remissness in the conduct of the United States.

The states general, on the other hand, having got early intelligence of the difficulty which he must encounter in raising money, had long flattered themselves with the hopes that he would not be able to procure it. They were afterwards amused for a considerable time by a report which had been propagated of his death; an event which they were persuaded would contribute more than any other that could happen to relax the archduke's exertions in the prosecution of the war. Influenced by these hopes, and this report, joined to their desire of avoiding any unnecessary expense, they had been uncommonly remiss in their military preparations. They had not availed themselves of Spinola's detention in Italy; and when they heard, not only that he had arrived in the Netherlands, but was daily receiving reinforcements of fresh troops from Germany and Italy, they were filled with the most disquieting apprehensions;

but it was now too late to remedy their error. They had not sufficient time to augment their army, by making new levies, as they used to do in Britain; and almost all the protestant soldiers, whom they might have enlisted in France and Germany, were, during the greatest part of this summer, detained at home; those in France, by a quarrel between the king and duke of Bouillon; and those in Germany, by an insurrection of the inhabitants of Brunswic against their sovereign.

When the campaign therefore was about to be opened, their forces, being greatly inferior in number to those of the enemy, prince Maurice was obliged to adopt a plan of operations which was merely defensive.

Having carefully provided for the security of such of the frontier towns, as were most exposed to danger, he next applied himself to fortify the banks of the Waal and the Issel, wheresoever he suspected that the enemy might attempt to transport their forces.

Along the banks of all that part of the Waal, which extends from the fort of Schenck to the isle of Bommel, redoubts, at small distances from each other, were raised on the north dike of the river. The troops, to which the defence of these redoubts was committed, were ordered to keep themselves in constant readiness to march to each other's assistance, on the first notice of an attack. And a great number of armed barks and boats were ordered to cruise in the river, to watch the

B O O K motions of the enemy, and to be ready to attack them, in case of their adventuring to embark.

II.

The same care and pains were taken in fortifying the Iffel; on the banks of which another line of redoubts was raised, extending from Arnheim to Hattem, which stands at the distance of only a few hours march from the Zuider Sea.

Spinola determined to penetrate into Utrecht and Holland.

These works, in which the Dutch were more expert than any other nation, and which had been carried on with surprising expedition, were far advanced before Spinola had fully prepared to take the field. His plan had, from the beginning, been what the states and prince Maurice had suspected, to penetrate into the provinces of Utrecht and Holland, through the Betuwe on one side, and the Veluwe on the other. He justly considered, that while the Dutch maintained their superiority at sea; it was only on their eastern frontier, he could expect to make any sensible impression; and that, in case he should so far succeed as to get possession of Utrecht, which was a large town, but weakly fortified, not only the numerous fortified places which lie to the north and east, would be easily compelled to submit, because their communication with Holland would be interrupted; but Holland itself, the chief seat of the wealth and strength of the revolted provinces would be laid open in that quarter, where it would be most successfully attacked.

He was sensible, that since the states had employed such wise precautions for their defence, it must now be extremely difficult for him to carry this plan into execution. But he still resolved to persist in it, and hoped, on one side or other, either to find the enemy off their guard, or to overpower them by his superior numbers.

Having divided his forces, he gave the command of one army, consisting of ten thousand foot and twelve hundred horse, to the count de Bucquoi, with instructions to attempt to transport it over the Waal into the country of Betuwe;
 and he himself conducted another, still more numerous, into the province of Overysfel, which had been the scene of his operations in the preceding year.

Bucquoi, having passed the Maese at Mooch, pitched his camp in the neighbourhood of that village, resolving to attempt the passage of the Waal, between the fort of Schenck and Nime-guen, and, in case of his being able to effect it, to lay siege to the latter of these places. With this view, he transported a great number of boats in carriages from the Maese; and having launched them in the Waal, he put a select body of troops on board, under the command of Justiniano, an Italian general of distinguished abilities.
 But before Justiniano could approach the opposite bank, Dubois, a French general, in the service of the states, had drawn up some companies of French and English soldiers, brought hastily from Nimeguen, and was prepared to dispute his landing. Justiniano still continued to advance, having first obliged all the Dutch armed vessels to retire, by planting a battery at the place of his embarkment. An obstinate engagement soon followed, in which he lost about one hundred and twenty men.

The rowers were intimidated, and being furnished with a pretext, from the rapidity of the current, they suffered the boats to fall down the stream. Dubois followed along the dike of the river. Other attempts were made afterwards to approach the shore, but the enemy were every where prepared to make resistance. At length the boats, which at first had proceeded in good order, being attacked by the Dutch armed vessels, which were six abreast, were thrown into confusion; and Justiniano, despairing of success, abandoned his attempt.

Spinola in the mean time had passed the Rhine at Rorerort, and was advancing through the province of Overysfel. But he was greatly retarded in his progress by an extraordinary quantity of rain which had begun to fall before he left Rorerort, and continued falling after he had set out upon his march. All the rivers were swelled to an unusual height; and at those places, where in ordinary seasons they were fordable, much time was lost in collecting boats, or in building temporary bridges. A great part of the country through which he marched being naturally wet and marshy, the roads were every where so much broken, that the one-half of his army was commonly a whole day behind the other. The artillery-carts, and his waggon with provisions, of which he had near three thousand, were dragged along with the utmost difficulty, and, as they often sunk in the mud, they proved almost every hour the occasion of confusion and delay. Many of his men fell sick from the unhealthiness of the season, and many were overpowered by the extraordinary fatigue which they underwent.

It was past the middle of July before he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Issel; and he still entertained the hopes of finding it practicable to bring his enterprize to the desired issue: but, as the rains had not yet begun to abate, he found the river every where unfordable. It was, at the same time, crowded with armed vessels, which must have rendered all attempts to cast a temporary bridge over it impracticable: and prince Maurice, having had leisure to fortify the opposite banks, had collected an army of ten thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, with which he stood prepared to oppose his passage.

After deliberating for some days what course he should pursue, he would have undertaken the siege of Deventer or Zutphen. But, besides that every precaution had been taken for their defence, prince Maurice had pitched his camp on the opposite side, at an equal distance from each of these places, and was ready, with forces nearly equal to his own, to march to their relief.

He had, in the mean time, sent the count de Solre with a detachment of his army down the river, to attempt a passage in the neighbourhood of Swoll, where he hoped the enemy might not be so much upon their guard. But de Solre was

B O O K vigorously repulsed by the garrison of Swoll, supported by some armed vessels, and obliged to return, without being able to execute his enterprise

Siege of Groll.

Spinola therefore found it necessary to relinquish his plan of penetrating through the country of Veliuwe, and to rest satisfied with employing his arms against some of the towns of the province of Zutphen, where Maurice could not attempt to interrupt his operations, without exposing himself to the risk of a general engagement. He first attacked the town of Lockem, and in a few days compelled the garrison to surrender. Immediately after which he laid siege to Groll, a town much better fortified than Lockem, and defended by a garrison of one thousand three hundred men. He was the more desirous to get possession of the place, as it would greatly contribute to the security of his former conquests, Lingen and Oldenzeel. And for the same reason prince Maurice was equally solicitous to prevent it from falling into his hands.

The prince, therefore, having augmented his army, by drawing the garrisons from Zutphen, Deventer, and other places, resolved to attempt, without delay, to raise the siege. But Spinola being acquainted with his design, pushed forward his operations with the most unremitted ardor, and, though not without considerable slaughter of his troops, he, in a few days, drove the garrison from all the out-works of the place.

They might still, however, have resisted till prince Maurice had arrived; but the governor, a young man of little experience, being either prevailed upon by the importunity of the inhabitants, or intimidated by the threats of Spinola, who sent him notice that if he did not immediately surrender, he would put all his garrison to the sword, capitulated on the ninth day after the commencement of the siege.

August 14.

Spinola had no sooner got possession of the town, and repaired some breaches in the fortifications, than he resolved to remove his army from Overysfel, where their health was greatly affected by the humidity of the soil, and to employ them in some other quarter, in which they would not be exposed to the same inconveniencies. Having called a council of war to assist him in his deliberations on this occasion, it was agreed, conformably to his own proposal, that no enterprize could be undertaken at that time, with any probability of success, of equal importance with the siege of Rhinberg.

This town, which commands one of the most convenient passages over the Rhine, had, several times, been taken and retaken, since the commencement of the war; and the Dutch, in whose possession it had remained since the year 1601, when it was subdued by prince Maurice, had, at an immense expense, made great additions to the fortifications. Round the old fortifications, they had drawn a new rampart, strengthened with halfmoons, redoubts, and ravelins, and had besieged.

B O O K surrounded the whole with a second ditch, of extraordinary breadth and depth; to which they
 II. had added a covered way. They had erected on 1606. the island, which is separated by a narrow channel from the town, a strong fort with regular bastions, of nearly the same extent, as the island itself, and they had furnished another fortification of still greater extent and strength, defended by a deep intrenchment, on the opposite bank of the river.

Spinola was aware of the difficulty he must encounter in reducing a town so strongly fortified, and which he knew likewise to be abundantly supplied with provisions and military stores: but, having been greatly disappointed by the failure of his enterprise against the interior provinces, and being desirous of performing some achievement, that might justify the opinion which the archduke and the court of Spain had conceived of his abilities, even the difficulty of accomplishing his design proved a motive for adopting it; while, at the same time, it determined him to exert his utmost vigor in the execution.

Having sent orders to the count de Bucquoi to come to his assistance, the count immediately directed his march towards Rhinberg along the south-side of the river, while he himself advanced towards it on the north. No delay was unnecessarily admitted by either general; but before they could throw up their intrenchments, prince Maurice, having received intelligence of their design, had time to send his brother Henry Frederic with a reinforcement to the garrison of two thousand men. Henry was accompanied on this occasion by a large body of cavalry, and having executed his commission without any loss, he immediately returned with the cavalry to the camp, where his brother was preparing to march to the relief of the besieged with all his forces.

In the mean time Spinola began the siege by attacking the fort above-mentioned, which had been raised on the side of the river opposite to the town. Of this fort, which communicated by temporary bridges with the island and with the town, and was deemed a post of the first importance, the defence was given to colonel Edmund, a Scotch officer of distinguished merit, who had been advanced in the service of the states from the rank of a common soldier to that of colonel. Besides a numerous garrison, upwards of seventy French gentlemen, who had come into the Netherlands to learn the military art, served under him as volunteers; and, that they might merit promotion on their return to their native country, were ready to expose themselves to every danger. With this determined band, supported by his garrison, both horse and foot, he sallied out against Spinola, as soon as he approached, threw a great part of his army into confusion, and made considerable slaughter. Spinola himself narrowly escaped being taken prisoner: but fresh troops coming forward to his assistance, Edmund was at length repulsed, and obliged to retire into the fort.

From the intrepid spirit which the garrison displayed in this fall, joined to the character of their commander, Spinola had reason to expect the most vigorous resistance. But a few days after, Edmund was killed by a shot from the enemy's camp while he was viewing his intrenchments; and the garrison, immoderately disheartened by his death, evacuated the fort in the following night, and passed over into the island.

This precipitate measure, the effect of sudden dejection, on account of the loss of the commander, was quickly attended with the most important consequences. The fortifications of the island were in a great measure commanded by the artillery of the fort which they had so hastily abandoned, and Spinola, by keeping up an incessant fire on them, from which their ramparts did not long afford protection, compelled them to take shelter in the town.

He then applied himself to strengthen the fortifications which he had gained on the banks of the river, in order to prevent prince Maurice from approaching on that side to the relief of the besieged; and having brought his bridge of boats above-mentioned from Rorerort, he transported the greatest part of his forces over the Rhine, to co-operate with the count de Bucquoi, who had begun his operations against the town.

Being already secured against an attack on the side towards the river, he now labored to render himself equally secure on the other side, by casting a strong intrenchment round his camp. And as he was perpetually present himself, and no hands were permitted to be idle, the work was carried on with extraordinary expedition, while a great proportion of his troops were employed in making their approaches to the town.

B O O K
II.

There was nothing omitted on the part of the garrison, which prudence and bravery could perform, to retard their progress. Animated by the example of the French volunteers, they spurned at danger, and made several vigorous sallies on the enemy, in some of which they succeeded in their attempt to demolish their works, and in all of them put considerable numbers to the sword.

But the exertions of the besiegers were in proportion to the obstacles which they found it necessary to surmount. Spinola had on no former occasion given more conspicuous proofs of vigor, skill, and bravery; he exposed himself to every danger to which his troops were exposed, and at the same time discovered the most perfect composure and tranquillity. The conduct of Bucquoi and Velasco fully justified the opinion that was entertained of their abilities. The duke d'Osuna, one of the first grandees in Spain, the princes of Caserta and Palestrina, and the marquisses of Est and Bentivoglio³⁰, were commonly mingled with the foremost combatants, and exhibited a bright example of the most heroic valor. The behaviour of the troops corresponded to this example of their general and officers. The Italians and Spaniards on the one hand, and the Walloons

BOOK and Germans on the other, animated by their
 II. leaders, and stimulated by ambition to surpass

 the most determined intrepidity.

The garrison therefore, notwithstanding the most obstinate resistance, were compelled to abandon one part of their fortifications after another; and it soon appeared, that in order to save themselves from utter destruction, they must, ere long, deliver up the town, unless prince Maurice should come speedily to their relief.

This general had already crossed the Rhine near Wesel, with an army amounting to fourteen or fifteen thousand men; and had advanced as far as Alphen, which lies at the distance of only a few hours march from Rhinberg. From his approaching so near, and from the various movements of his troops, Spinola could not doubt that he intended to attack his intrenchments. He therefore immediately applied himself to fortify some hills adjoining to his camp; and having ordered such of his forces as had been left for guarding the fort on the opposite side on the river, to come to his assistance, he stood prepared to accept of battle, in case it should be offered by the enemy.

But prince Maurice was too prudent, and too well acquainted with the character of Spinola, as well as with the strength of his present situation, to expose his army to so great a risk. From the time when the garrison had abandoned the fort on the opposite side of the river, he had despaired of being able to raise the siege, as all communication with the town on that side was thereby intercepted, and the enemy enabled to effectuate a junction of their forces. They were now greatly superior to his in number. No precaution had been omitted by their general to prevent a surprise. It was impossible to attack them without resolving to try the fortune of a battle. And he considered that while the preservation of Rhinberg would be the only fruit which he could reap from a victory, a defeat must be attended with the loss of other towns of still greater importance, and, at the same time, render it practicable for Spinola to execute his first plan of an invasion of the country beyond the Waal; he thought it rather fortunate that this general, with so numerous an army, had engaged in an enterprise which could not greatly affect the prosperity of the United Provinces; and hoped that, by his persisting in it, he would exhaust his strength, and lose what remained of the season fit for action.

Many of prince Maurice's countrymen, however, were dissatisfied with his inactivity on this occasion, and the states general sent deputies to his camp to acquaint him they had expected he would have made an attempt to raise the siege. But having brought over the deputies to his opinion, he despised the general censure to which his conduct was exposed, and still adhered to his resolution.

By the various movements which he made he prevented the garrison from despairing of his

But Utenhove, the governor, coming at length to perceive that the prince had no serious intention to relieve him, and dreading, if he persisted much longer in the defence, that the town might be taken by assault, resolved to capitulate, and offered to deliver up the town upon certain honorable conditions, which Spinola readily granted, as the winter-season was fast approaching, and his army had already suffered such considerable diminution that in several regiments hardly one half of the original number remained at the termination of the siege ¹¹.

Spinola had hitherto preserved the most perfect discipline in his army, and had fully experienced the benefit arising from it, in the facility with which he procured supplies from the neutral countries adjoining to his camp. But, some time before the present period, a convoy with a part of his money, having been intercepted by the enemy, and the affairs of some merchants, who had accepted his bills, having fallen into disorder, in consequence of losses sustained at sea, he was no longer able to pay his troops with the same regularity as formerly, and considerable arrears had become due. They had begun to complain before the termination of the siege, and soon after the same mutinous spirit appeared among them, which had so often proved pernicious to the Spanish interest in the Netherlands. Spinola, in his treatment of the mutineers, mingled gentleness with severity, and omitted nothing in his power to prevent the infection from becoming general; but his endeavours were in a great measure ineffectual. A considerable number deserted, and went over to the enemy's camp; while a body of two thousand horse and foot, with several officers, directed their march towards Breda, and put themselves under the protection of prince Maurice; who, agreeably to his usual maxims, resolved to encourage them in their revolt; and sent orders to the governor of Breda to grant them permission to fortify their quarters under the cannon of the town, and to purchase provisions from the citizens.

Mutiny and troops.

As soon as intelligence had reached him of the surrender of Rhinberg, Maurice had retired with his army into the province of Overijssel, and he now resolved to embrace the opportunity, which the mutiny of Spinola's troops afforded him, to recover some of the towns in that province which had been lost. He first attacked Lockem, which he reduced in a few days, and immediately after he laid siege to Groll. Spinola, anxious for the preservation of a place which he deemed of great importance, immediately conceived the design of attempting to relieve it, and called a council of war to deliberate on the subject. A great majority of his officers endeavoured to persuade him to relinquish his design, by arguments drawn from the lateness of the season, the humidity of the country through which he must pass, joined to the weakness of his army, and the pernicious consequences which must accompany a defeat. He was deeply sensible of the force of these objections. But he considered that the loss of Groll would probably soon draw after it that of all his other conquests beyond the Rhine; that his late conquest of Rhinberg would thereby become in a great measure insignificant, as it derived its importance chiefly from the secure communication which it afforded with his other conquests; that the glory he had acquired would thus be quickly buried in oblivion; and the fruit of all those labors lost, which had been attended with so great an expence of blood and treasure.

Stimulated by these motives, he persisted in his design, though it could not perhaps be justified on the principles of prudence; and instantly selected from his whole army eight thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, on whose obedience and bravery he could depend for the execution of any enterprize, however dangerous. These troops were highly pleased with the flattering distinction which they received, and began their march with every symptom of ardor and alacrity.

The success of his enterprize Spinola knew must entirely depend on his preventing the enemy from having time to complete their intrenchments, and with this view he advanced towards them with the utmost rapidity, and in a few days arrived within sight of the town. Prince Maurice, on the other hand, having from the beginning believed that Spinola would not attempt to interrupt his operations, had neglected to employ such precautions as might have obstructed his approach. Being desirous to spare his men, he had not as usual drawn any lines of circumvallation round the place, and his camp itself had no other defence on one side but some marshy ground, which he had thought sufficient to prevent any sudden incurfion of the enemy.

It was in this quarter that Spinola resolved to begin his attack; and having drawn up his army in four battalions, each of which had a small train of artillery attending them, and a part of the cavalry secured by a double row of carriages on their flanks, he first rode through the several ranks, encouraging and exhorting them, and at the same time declaring that he was determined either to die or conquer; immediately after which he gave the signal to advance.

But prince Maurice had from the first appearance of the enemy resolved to decline the combat, and had already begun to raise the siege. He first withdrew his troops in good order to an advantageous situation, near his camp, where he was free from danger, and soon after retired to a greater distance from the town. His army was greatly superior in number to that of the enemy; but many of his men were sickly, and worn out with the fatigues of a long campaign; and the event of battles he considered, depended less on the numbers than on the intrepidity and vigor of the combatants. To the ignorant his conduct was a matter of censure and surprize : but, as both his skill and courage were unquestionable, the constraint which he imposed upon himself on this occasion was, by the more prudent and judicious, deemed deserving of admiration and applause.

Such was the conclusion of this campaign, through accidents against which no human prudence could provide. Spinola had been disappointed in his hopes of reducing the interior parts of the United Provinces; but, from his conduct in the siege of Rhinberg, and the relief of Groll, all the world were satisfied that, on his part, neither abilities nor vigor would have been wanting to carry the plan which he had concerted into successful execution ¹².

SOON after the transactions above related a negotiation for peace was begun, in the course of which it appeared that neither of the two contending parties were intent on the farther prosecution of the war. Negociation for a peace.

It may justly appear surprising, that a state possessed of so small a territory as the republic of the United Provinces should have been able to support the expence of a war at home against so potent an enemy. Yet, during the continuance of this war, their exertions were not confined to the Netherlands. They maintained at the same time a numerous fleet of ships of war, with which they generally proved victorious in all

B O O K their naval rencounters with the enemy, while
 111. they fuccessfully attacked his dominions in the most distant quarters of the globe. They had been much indebted for their success in the Low Countries to the assistance in money and troops which they received from Henry IV. and queen Elizabeth; but as the aid which these princes could afford them was never liberal, they must have sunk under the power of their enemies, but for those copious resources which they opened by the extension of their trade.

Progress of arts in the low Countries.

The inhabitants of the Low Countries had for several centuries been distinguished by their industry, and their skill in manufactures. Even in the time of the Roman republic, they had given proofs of their superior ingenuity¹. When by the irruptions of those northern barbarians who overturned the Roman empire, all the useful arts of life, as well as letters and science, had been well nigh extinguished, they were first revived and successfully cultivated by the Flemings, and other inhabitants of the Netherlands. About the middle of the tenth century, free marts, or fairs, were established by Baldwin, earl of Flanders, to which great numbers of merchants from Germany, France, and other places resorted, to purchase the manufactures in which the Flemings so much excelled. The example of Baldwin was imitated by his successors for almost three centuries, during which period the industry and commerce of the Flemings were carried to the greatest height, and remained unrivalled by the other European nations. But the succeeding sovereigns, finding it necessary for defraying the expense of the wars in which they were often engaged with the neighbouring princes, to impose various taxes on commodities, great numbers of the manufacturers and merchants, unaccustomed to such impositions, withdrew into Holland, where they were at once free from taxes, and much less exposed to those calamities of war, which they had often experienced in the more open provinces of Flanders and Brabant.

The art of salting herrings having, in the fourteenth century, been discovered by William Burem, a native of Pierulem, in Flanders, the herring trade, which hath proved so copious a source of wealth and industry to the Netherlands, was first cultivated by the citizens of Sluys and Bruges; but it was soon afterwards communicated to the Dutch, who improved to the utmost the advantages which their situation afforded them for carrying it on with success. They were, at the same time, in possession of the cod and whale fishery; and, while they exported great quantities of fish, and of manufactures, they were every year extending their trade in the southern parts of Europe, in the countries which lie round the Baltic, and in those parts of Germany with which they communicated by the Rhine and other rivers which pass through their territory, before they fall into the sea.

III.

Before the middle of the sixteenth century the provinces of Holland and Zealand underwent an important change by the great increase of the number of inhabitants, occasioned by the persecutions on account of religion in France and Germany. Charles the Fifth had resolved to extirpate the Protestants from his dominions in the Netherlands, as well as from those in Germany; but he had been in a great measure deterred from the prosecution of his design, partly by the partial affection which he bore towards his Dutch and Flemish subjects, and partly by his dread of the fatal consequences, with which the rigorous execution of his edicts might be attended, with regard to their manufactures and their trade.

Both the French and German Protestants therefore found an asylum in the Netherlands, and imported thither their families, their wealth, and their industry. Of the advantages resulting from thence Brabant and Flanders participated in common with the more northern maritime provinces, but the intolerant and oppressive Spirit of the Spanish government prevented them from long enjoying these advantages. It was chiefly by the manufacturers and merchants that the opinions of the reformers were embraced; they were persecuted with the most unrelenting fury, and they likewise most severely felt the burden of those oppressive taxes that were imposed. By the cruel treatment which they received, several thousands of them were compelled to withdraw into other countries. Many went over to England, where Elizabeth was ready to afford them her protection. But when the maritime provinces had asserted their liberty, and Ghent, Bruges, and Antwerp, after an unsuccessful struggle, had again submitted to the Spanish yoke, by much the greater part of the Flemish emigrants retired into Holland or Zealand, and took up their residence in Middleburgh, Haerlem, Leyden, and Amsterdam. In their new abode they enjoyed the free exercise of their religion, a privilege which they deemed a compensation for every hardship they might find it necessary to undergo. The country which they had made choice of being of small extent, could not afford sustenance for one third part of its inhabitants. But being situated in the heart of Europe, at the mouth of several navigable rivers, and most of the towns communicating with each other by these rivers, or by canals, no country could be more commodious either for inland or foreign trade. While their situation therefore prompted them to apply themselves to commerce, by the conveniencies which it afforded for carrying it on, they at the same time found it necessary to engage in it, as the only means of their subsistence and support.

No branch of it, to which they could find access, or from which any profit could be derived, was neglected; nor did they confine themselves, like other nations, to the exporting of such of their own commodities as they could spare, or the importing of such commodities from other countries as their necessities required, but they merce.

B O O K likewise traded for other nations; and had many
III. of their ships continually employed in carrying the merchandize of one nation to another. This species of commerce had been formerly possessed by the Anseatic or maritime towns on the Baltic; but the situation of the Dutch, between the Northern and Southern European nations, was more commodious for carrying it on. The necessity which their circumstances imposed upon them, of continual action and employment, had prompted them to engage in it; and their extreme frugality and rigid economy, by rendering it practicable for them to trade for smaller profits, had enabled them to wrest it from their competitors, and to engross it almost wholly to themselves.

Among the various branches of commerce in which the Dutch displayed so much activity and enterprise, one of the most considerable consisted in carrying from the countries lying round the Baltic to the different ports in Spain and Portugal, great quantities of corn and naval stores; in return for which, besides fruits, wine, and other productions of those Southern Kingdoms, they received the gold and silver of America, and the spices and other commodities which the Portuguese imported from India or Lisbon. The period when this branch of trade commenced, cannot be exactly ascertained. Being of small extent at first, it has escaped the notice of historians. But it had become considerable soon after the beginning of the sixteenth century, and before the middle of that century, it was deemed a species of commerce of the first importance. It was equally necessary to Spain and Portugal as to the United Provinces, and was for this reason connived at by the court of Spain for many years after the revolt in the Netherlands; being still carried on by the Dutch themselves, who found no other precaution necessary but to sail under the flag of some neutral power at peace with Spain. But Philip's resentment against his revolted subjects being on some occasions too violent to be restrained by considerations of policy or prudence, the Dutch ships were sometimes confiscated, the commanders thrown into prison, and the sailors either sent to the galleys, or compelled to serve on board the Spanish fleet. This monarch having come at length to suspect that the commerce which he had hitherto in some measure permitted, was of infinitely greater advantage to the enemy than to himself, and being desirous to deprive them of what he believed to be a principal source of their increasing wealth and strength, he resolved to enforce an edict which he had formerly published, prohibiting his subjects in Spain and Portugal from holding intercourse with the revolted provinces; the Dutch traders were, in consequence of this resolution, every year more harrassed than the preceding, till the restraints and vexations which they suffered had become intolerable.

Finding themselves therefore under the necessity of abandoning this gainful traffic, they began to consider whether they might not, in another way, secure to themselves the advantages which they had hitherto derived from it.

Having so long acted as carriers for the Portuguese, in distributing the rich productions of the East over the Northern nations, they well knew where to find the speediest sale for these productions, and they likewise knew that the demand for them was every year increasing: nor, when they considered the great advantages of their situation, joined to their superior naval power, could they doubt of being able to deprive the Portuguese of this profitable trade, provided they could procure the commodities requisite for carrying it on.

But, for this purpose, it was necessary they should perform a voyage of several thousand leagues, through seas with which they were unacquainted; that they should visit countries of which they were almost entirely ignorant; and after their arrival there, should enter into a competition with a bold and enterprising nation, who, besides being in possession of the trade of these countries, had established a formidable military force for its protection. The Dutch, though sufficiently aware of these difficulties, were not thereby deterred from persisting in their design. In order to shorten their voyage, the great extent of which through unknown seas, was the principal cause of their dread, they made three different attempts to discover a passage to India, by the Northern Ocean; but these attempts, like all others of the same kind, proving fruitless, they resolved to undertake the voyage to India by the customary route, provided they could procure some person already acquainted with it to conduct them. BOOK

III.

It happened opportunely when they were deliberating on the subject, that some merchants of Amsterdam received an application from Cornelius Houtman, a native of Flanders, who was in prison for debt in Lisbon; representing, that having made several voyages with the Portuguese to India, he was not only well acquainted with the course of navigation thither, but likewise with the nature of the India trade; and that, in case they would furnish him with a sum of money to purchase his liberty, he would gladly communicate to them all necessary information, and undertake in person the conduct of their ships. His proposal was instantly accepted, the money which he requested for his release, was transmitted to him, and soon afterwards he arrived at Amsterdam. The merchants, highly satisfied with the information which they received from him, and perceiving him to be a man of uncommon penetration and abilities, immediately formed an association, to which they gave the name of the Company of Distant Countries, and equipped a squadron, consisting of four ships, which they put under his command. This little squadron had two hundred and fifty men on board, and a hundred pieces of cannon, which were furnished by the states; besides naval and military stores, and a variety of merchandize fitted to the taste of the Indian nations².

² The two largest of these ships were of two hundred and thirty tons; the third, of one hundred and thirty; and the

As the principal object of the voyage was to procure more particular information than they yet possessed concerning the country, and the different branches of trade which it afforded, Houtman was instructed, as much as possible, to avoid the settlements of the Portuguese, and carefully to abstain from all hostilities, when they were not necessary for his defence: nor was he inattentive to these instructions; he might, in his way to India, have seized a rich carac in which the archbishop of Goa was returning home; but though he went on board that vessel, in order to procure intelligence, he suffered it to proceed on its voyage without molestation.

June, 1595.

After visiting the coasts of Africa and Brasil, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and proceeded to the isle of Madagascar, in which island and that of St. Mary he was detained for some time, in consequence of a dissension which happened between him and the other commanders, with regard to the route which it was proper to pursue. From St. Mary he at length proceeded to Sumatra, and from thence to Bantam, in the island of Java, where he began to purchase pepper and other spices. At first he was well received, and no aversion was discovered by the natives to enter into a commercial treaty with him; but the jealousy of the Portuguese merchants, a considerable number of whom resided at Bantam, being instantly alarmed, they resolved to exert their influence to effectuate his ruin. For this end, carrying rich presents in their hands, the only means of procuring access to the princes of India, they represented the Dutch to the king or general of Bantam as pirates, and the common enemies of human kind, of whose rapine and violence his subjects would soon have fatal experience, if they did not embrace the present opportunity, when they were few in number, to cut them off, and to prevent their return. The governor, ignorant, and therefore credulous, was easily persuaded of the truth of this representation, and consented to follow the counsel that was given him. But distrusting his ability to destroy them by open force, he resolved to employ fraud and treachery. He pretended an inclination to have a commercial treaty, which had been proposed by the Dutch, concluded, and desired that Houtman and the other officers would come to his palace to adjust the terms. Suspecting no deceit, Houtman, and one or two more, complied with his request, and were immediately taken into custody. The governor had absurdly believed that all the officers would have accepted his invitation, and that the ships, having no persons on board that were fit to command them, would then have become an easy prey. Being disappointed in this expectation, he dreaded the consequences of putting his prisoners to death, while their companions remained at liberty to take vengeance on him for his perfidy. Still, however,

B O O K he detained them in prison, and refused to listen
 III. to the repeated solicitations of their friends in their behalf; till the Dutch ships having begun to cannonade the town, laid part of it in ruins, he at length restored them to their liberty.

Soon after this, Houtman finding, on a review of his men, that by death, occasioned chiefly by the climate, they had suffered a diminution of more than one third of their number, ordered one of his ships to be burnt, and set sail for Europe with the rest; carrying with him some of the natives of Madagascar and Sumatra, a Japanese, a Chinese, and a pilot of the name of Abdul, distinguished for his knowledge of the Indian seas. After a prosperous voyage of between five and six months, he arrived safe in the Texel in the beginning of August, 1597, having spent almost two years and a half in his expedition. He hardly brought home with him wealth sufficient to defray the expense of his equipment; but both he and his companions were now able to give the most satisfactory information to their employers. The Indians too, whom he had induced to accompany him, were likely to be afterwards of the greatest use; and the hopes which his countrymen conceived of greater success in their future voyages, were raised to the greatest height³.

The Portuguese, they knew, would give all the opposition in their power to every attempt which they lis, Lugd. Batav. 4to. 1657, p. 117, &c.

they could make, either to establish their trade, or to procure a settlement in India; but, from the accounts which they had received of the declining power of the Portuguese, and of the manner in which the eastern nations were affected towards them, they hoped to be able, either to elude, or to counteract their malignity.

A bolder and more enterprising spirit had never been displayed than the Portuguese had manifested in their numerous conquests and discoveries; and no conquests, so extensive and important, had been ever made with so small a force, or by a nation possessed of such scanty resources. Animated at once by almost all the passions which most powerfully impel the human mind, by avarice, by bigotry, and by ambition, they had performed exploits, which seemed to be beyond the power of man, and were regarded by all those barbarous nations, over whom they triumphed with so great facility, as more than men. They had made themselves masters of all the more important parts of the coast of Guinea. They had expelled the Arabians from that of Zanguebar, where they had formed settlements, which gave them the command of all the gold and silver mines in their country, from Sofala to Melinda. They had acquired a decided superiority over the Egyptians; though aided by the Venetians, in the Red Sea; and had thus put an entire stop to that gainful trade which the Venetians had so long carried on with India, by the way of Suez and Alexandria. Their arms had been attended with

III. the coast of Persia, Malabar, and Malacca. They had acquired possession of Ceylon, and the Molucca and Sunda islands; and, by their establishment at Macao, they had secured to themselves the trade of China and Japan.

Had the Portuguese, at the present period, possessed the same vigor and intrepidity of which they had given such conspicuous proof on their first arrival in India, it is probable that any attempt to dispossess them would have proved abortive: but they were no longer the same people as before. The first conquerors of India were all extinct; and their successors, a few only excepted, were men defiled with the most odious vices, which rendered them a scourge to the people committed to their care. Removed to so great a distance from the seat of government, as gave them hopes of impunity for the most flagitious crimes; corrupted by prosperity, and enervated by the climate, while their religion, of the most illiberal kind, only served to render them more ferocious, their conduct towards the natives was equally oppressive and perfidious. Attempts were made, by some virtuous viceroys, to reform the numberless abuses which had been committed; but these great men, whose names are handed down to posterity with just applause, were too few in number, and their government of too short continuance, to produce any permanent effect. Corruption of every kind had struck its roots too deep to be so easily extirpated; and the natives, who had been long disgusted, began to feel contempt, mixed with abhorrence of their oppressors, in the room of that respect and dread which they had formerly been accustomed to entertain.

B O O K
III.

After the subjection of Portugal to the crown of Spain, the affairs of the Portuguese in India were more than ever neglected by the government at home, and disorders of every kind were increased and multiplied. It was believed by some persons, that Philip II. agreeably to the maxims of his malignant policy, was well pleased that the power of his new subjects should suffer a diminution, as he would thereby find it easier to maintain his usurped authority. But it is more reasonable to suppose that his attention being wholly engrossed by objects, which he judged to be of greater importance, he had not leisure to attend to the affairs in India; and found it, therefore, in some measure necessary to leave the several governors at liberty to act without control. However this be, it is certain that they acted more like independent monarchs than the subjects of one common prince, to whom they were accountable for their conduct, and seemed to have forgotten the relation which they had bore, and the duties which they owed, both to their country and to one another; while each individual was solely attentive to his private interest, and seldom scrupled to promote it at the expense either of faith or of humanity. The natives had, on different occasions, taken arms, and attempted to vindicate their rights against their lawless oppressors.

BOOK

III.

Their efforts hitherto had not been vigorous, nor attended in the issue with success; but they were become more than ever impatient under the injuries which they suffered, and longed for an opportunity to assert their liberty.

Such was the state of the Portuguese, and such the disposition of the natives with regard to them, when the Dutch made their first voyage to the Indies. They were thereby encouraged to persist in their attempt to establish trade in those parts; and a spirit of enterprise and adventure was excited, which soon diffused itself over all the maritime provinces. The Spanish ministers imprudently contributed to quicken this adventurous spirit, and to confirm the Dutch in the resolution they had formed, by republishing, soon after the accession of the present king, an edict, prohibiting the Spaniards and Portuguese from all commercial intercourse with them in the strictest manner, and under the severest penalties. They might have perceived the folly of this measure from the effects which their former restrictions on the Dutch trade had already produced; but they attended only to the immediate inconvenience which was occasioned thereby to the enemy, without considering either the advantages which the Dutch might ultimately derive from their prohibition, or the prejudice which the Spaniards and Portuguese were likely to sustain.

By the advice of the count de Fuentes, a nobleman of great abilities, but naturally haughty and severe, and extremely ignorant of the commercial interest of his country, the prohibitory edict was carried into the most rigorous execution. A strict inquiry was made, at all the sea-ports of Spain and Portugal, whether any of the Dutch had come thither under the colors of any neutral power; and as a considerable number were discovered to have been guilty of this temerity, their ships and goods were confiscated, and they themselves either cast into prison, or sent to the galleys and condemned to work as slaves.

The states general, in order to express their contempt of this conduct of the Spanish court, published an edict, in which, besides prohibiting all intercourse between their subjects and those of the king of Spain, they declared, that they would treat as enemies the subjects of all neutral powers, who should carry commodities, of whatever kind, to the ports of Spain, Portugal, or Flanders.

To this manifesto, copies of which were sent to the courts of the several maritime powers, no answer was returned, nor any objection made, by the states or princes who received it; and the French monarch gave, on this occasion, a striking proof of his favor for the Dutch, by publishing a declaration, that if any of his subjects should, for the space of six months, adventure to trade with Spain, they must do it at their private risk, without the hopes of his protection.

While the Dutch in this manner showed their contempt of the Spanish trade, and the prohibitory edict, being more than ever intent on prosecuting

the trade which they had begun in India, several different associations were formed by the merchants in Holland and Zealand, almost immediately after the return of their fleet under the command of Houtman; and before the end of the following year, more than eighty ships, completely equipped, and furnished with various articles of commerce, were sent out; the greater part of them to the East-Indies, and some to the West, and to the coasts of Africa, while others were ordered to attempt the passage by the Straits of Magellan into the Pacific Ocean.

They were divided into small fleets, consisting chiefly of four, six, or eight armed vessels, from about one hundred and fifty to three or four hundred tons, some of which had regular troops on board, that were furnished by Prince Maurice and the states. Their instructions were nearly the same as those which had been given to the commanders employed in the first expedition, to avoid the settlements of the Portuguese and, as much as possible, to abstain from hostilities. But it was impossible for them strictly to comply with these instructions. Their enemies were spread almost every where over the coasts which they visited; and being equally animated by jealousy, and by resentment, were resolved to give them all the opposition, and to do them all the mischief in their power. They had labored to inspire the natives with the same malignity; and on the minds of some of them their misrepresentations had produced the desired effect. It was not only the dangers, therefore, of voyages, so long and difficult, through climates the most adverse to the human constitution, which the Dutch encountered in the prosecution of their design; but, after their arrival on those coasts, where the trade, which they desired to establish, must be carried on, they found it necessary to fight, and to negotiate by turns. They had the prejudices of the natives to overcome; and they were obliged to stand perpetually on their guard against the machinations of the Portuguese, who practised every method which they could devise to accomplish their destruction, whether by secret fraud, or open force and violence.

The Portuguese had no such formidable opposition to encounter, when they first arrived in India. The ships of their enemies were few in number, and much inferior to their's, both in respect of strength and size; and the towns which they attacked were weakly fortified, and unskillfully defended by a dastardly, effeminate, and feeble race of men. Whereas the Dutch encountered fleets of ships of the same construction as their own, and were obliged to contend with an enemy, who, besides being accustomed to the climate, and familiarly acquainted with the Indian seas, were not less distinguished than themselves for their naval and military skill.

But their conduct was wisely adapted to their circumstances, being equally prudent whether it respected the natives or the Portuguese. They soon convinced the former of the falshood of

B O O K those injurious aspersions which the latter had cast
 III. upon their character; and by the moderation, justice, and humanity, which they displayed in all their dealings, proved that, in purity of manners, they were much superior to their accusers. They were soon allowed to trade in many places, from whence the Portuguese had labored to exclude them; and as with indefatigable industry they improved to the utmost every advantage which they enjoyed, they came, ere long, to procure admission to several of the most important branches of commerce.

As the extension of their trade, and not conquest, was the great object which they pursued, they avoided all unnecessary rencounters with the Portuguese; but they were generally well prepared to defend themselves when attacked, gave many proofs of the most determined bravery, and sometimes triumphed over the superior force and numbers of the enemy. Still, however, they kept the great end of their voyages perpetually in view. The same time which they found it necessary to spend in repairing the damages sustained in battle, was likewise employed in trading with the natives; and as soon as their cargoes were complete, and their damages repaired, they returned to Holland: thus enriching their employers, and enabling them not only to defray the expense of their equipment, but to exert themselves with redoubled vigor in the prosecution of their designs.

Although some of the numberless voyages which they had undertaken, had, through misconduct or cross accidents, proved unfortunate, they had been in general sufficiently successful to render it their interest to persevere. The societies, however, of merchants, by whom the Indian trade had been carried on, were not satisfied with the profits which it afforded. They complained that too great a number of adventurers had engaged in it; and that in consequence thereof, as they must pay much higher prices for Indian goods than had been formerly given by the Portuguese, so they found it necessary to sell them much cheaper; and would either be ruined by their efforts to establish this new branch of commerce, or obliged to abandon it altogether.

This evil, which could hardly have been apprehended in the beginning of a trade, attended with so great expense and danger, would probably have soon been remedied by a diminution of the number of competitors, the natural consequence of small profits in any branch of commerce; and if the evil complained of, had been the only reason for the interposition of the states, it may be questioned whether they ought to have interposed. But, besides this, there was another reason of greater weight. The Portuguese in India, being under the direction of their governors or viceroys, could more easily act in concert, than the great number of independent Dutch societies: and the small fleets or single ships, belonging to these societies, were exposed to the danger of being separately attacked and destroyed one after another, by an enemy with whom if they too could act in concert, they might be able to contend. Determined by these considerations, the states general in the year 1602, united the several societies of traders into one body, under the name of the East-India company; on which, besides the exclusive privilege of trading beyond the Cape of Good Hope on the one hand, and the Straits of Magellan on the other; they conferred the power of administering justice, of building forts, of appointing governors and garrisons, of raising troops, and of making peace and war with the Indian princes. A fund, amounting to more than six millions of florins, was immediately subscribed for by the merchants in the principal maritime towns, and managers were appointed, under whose direction all the trade to India was henceforth to be carried on. This company being the first regular commercial society, of which we read in history, has served in some measure as a model to all the trading companies that have been created in modern times. It consisted chiefly of those who had been engaged as private adventurers in the Indian trade; and by these men, who had profited from their former errors, and were well acquainted with that trade in all its branches, the affairs of the company were, from the beginning, conducted with consummate skill; nor was their good fortune inferior to the prudence which they displayed. Having by their justice and moderation, extinguished those groundless prejudices against their national character, which the Portuguese had labored to instil into the minds of the Indian princes, they were almost every where received with favor, and in several places obtained permission to establish factories, and to build forts for the protection of their trade. They were requested by some of these princes, to lend their assistance in expelling the Portuguese, and in their rencounters with that nation they generally came off victorious. They made innumerable captures of their richest ships. Their trade was every year more widely extended, and the profits arising from it, were greater than they had been accustomed to derive from any former branch of commerce. The principal causes of their weakness have been already explained, and to these must be added this consideration, that, on the other hand, the trade and power of the Portuguese were quickly hastening to decay. While their rivals were every season receiving reinforcements both of ships and troops, they were left unsupported by their friends in Europe, to struggle with the difficulties which surrounded them. The strength of Portugal had long been exhausted by the too numerous emigration of its inhabitants, and the Spanish ministers, besides that their attention was entirely occupied by other objects, found more than sufficient employment at home for all the force and treasure which they possessed.

It was this reason, and not, as has been supposed, the desire of having Portugal reduced to a state of weakness, and thereby rendered more tame and obsequious, that prevented the Court

BOOK of Spain from affording that assistance to the Portuguese in India, which their exigencies so much required at the present period. They were almost equally inattentive, or equally unable to afford support to the Spanish traders and colonists as to the Portuguese. Many captures were made of their ships loaded with the treasures of America and the Indies. Their fleets were sometimes blocked up in their harbours, till the season fit for entering on their voyages had elapsed; and their settlements on the coasts were often plundered, sometimes, by the Dutch, and sometimes by the English, with impunity.

Nor was it only in the Indies, and on the coasts of America, that the subjects of the Spanish monarchy were exposed to the depredations of their enemies. While the war with England subsisted, the coasts of Spain itself had been insulted both by the Dutch and English, and many ships in the harbours either taken or destroyed. After the establishment of peace with France and England, the Spanish ministers had conceived the hopes of finding it easy, not only to resist the most vigorous efforts of the Dutch, but ere long, to reduce them to obedience. But although they had now only a single enemy to contend with, whom they had long been accustomed to despise, that enemy, through the great increase of their trade and navigation, were become more powerful, while they themselves, from the decay of their trade and other causes, were much weaker than before. For some time past, therefore, the Spaniards had found it equally difficult to defend themselves against the Dutch alone, as they had done formerly against the Dutch, and English, and French united.

Philip's ministers were not ignorant of the sources from whence the Dutch had received so great an accession of wealth and power; and of one of these we have seen, they had in vain endeavoured to deprive them, by the prohibition of their trade with Spain and Portugal. Another not less copious they knew, was their cod and herring fishery, on the coast of England and the Netherlands; and to deprive them of this, and at the same time, to intercept their navigation in the narrow seas, between the southern and northern states of Europe, had for some years been a principal object of their attention. It was with this view that all those galleys had been equipped, which, as formerly related, had been intrusted to the command of Frederic de Spinola; and with the same view there had been fitted out at Nieuport and Dunkirk a great number of armed vessels, from which the Dutch suffered considerable molestation in their coasting trade and fishery. But all Spinola's galleys had either been destroyed or had fallen into the hands of the Dutch, when they got possession of Sluys; and the States having provided some ships of war on purpose, had, on some occasions, taken signal vengeance on the privateers of Nieuport and Dunkirk, the crews of which they always treated as pirates, and either hanged or drowned. Their fleets now rode triumphant

The courts of Spain and Brussels had long beheld this superiority of the naval power of the Dutch, with much anxiety. They dreaded from it the utter extinction of their commerce; and perceived, that in order to prevent this effect, it would, ere long, be necessary to put a period to the war. Nor did peace appear to be less necessary, when they considered what had hitherto been the issue of their military operations at land,
 than when they reflected on the numberless losses which they had sustained at sea. Their most strenuous endeavours to reduce the revolted provinces to obedience had served only to render the people more expert, and more obstinate in their defence: to strengthen the bond of their internal union; and to confirm the neighbouring powers in their resolution of affording them assistance and support. The maritime provinces almost surrounded by the sea, and every where intersected by the rivers and canals, had hitherto been found impregnable; and the southern frontier had lately been strengthened by the acquisition of some

The Marquis of Spinola had wisely directed his attack against the confederates in that quarter, where they were the worst prepared for resistance. The army which he commanded, had been the most numerous which could possibly be collected.

Through the united exertions which had been made by the archdukes, the court of Spain, and by the marquis himself, who had mortgaged his ample fortune in order to procure money, his troops having regularly received their pay, had been kept under the strictest discipline. All his operations had been conducted with consummate skill; and nothing had been omitted on his part which might have ensured success; yet he had been utterly unable to surmount the difficulties which he encountered. Instead of penetrating into the interior provinces, he had been obliged to rest satisfied with conquests, from whence no solid advantage could be derived. From the fatigues which they had undergone, and the moisture of the climate, the army had lately suffered considerable diminution. Those funds from whence the marquis had defrayed the expenses of the last campaign, had for several months been almost entirely exhausted; and considerable arrears being now resting to the soldiers, the same mutinous spirit by which they had formerly been actuated, had again begun to appear. A part of them as above-mentioned, had already abandoned their

B O O K officers ; and having chosen others from among
III. themselves , had begun to indulge themselves in 1607 every species of licentiousness. To these disorders no adequate remedy could possibly be applied during the continuance of the war. All the money which could be raised in the Netherlands , or furnished by the court of Spain ; would be hardly sufficient to defray the expense of the new levies which must be made before the next campaign. And in the mean time the licentious spirit of the mutineers must diffuse itself throughout the army ; and both the army itself and the provinces , be thereby exposed an easy prey to a watchful enemy ; who , being possessed of more certain resources for carrying on the war , had been always ready to avail themselves of every advantage that was afforded them ⁵ :

Besides these considerations there were some others , which with Philip and his ministers , were supposed to have had still greater weight. A report at that time prevailed , that the Dutch , having entered into a correspondence with the Moors on the coast of Barbary , had agreed to furnish them with ships to transport an army into Spain. And another report was likewise propagated , that the French monarch having formed the design of annexing the Netherlands to France , was now prepared and resolved to carry it into execution. It does not appear , that there was any just foundation for either of these reports. But they seem to have made a strong impression on the minds of the the Spanish ministers ; who, dreading that either an interruption of that domestic tranquillity which Spain had so long enjoyed , or the entire loss of the Netherlands , must be the consequence of the continuance of the war , were now more desirous than ever to have it brought to a conclusion*.

The archduke was still more solicitous for peace than the Spanish ministers. From the commencement of his sovereignty he had lived in perpetual disquietude. He had fully experienced the vanity of his hopes of success from the support of Spain, which he knew to be too much exhausted , and removed at too great a distance from the scene of action , to afford him the assistance that was necessary. He had no heirs of his own body to whom he could transmit his dominions. And both he and the infanta , besides being sensibly affected by the calamities in which their subjects were involved, were desirous to pass the remainder of their days in peace.

They were confirmed in their resolution by the marquis of Spinola, who did not hesitate in advising peace , notwithstanding the renown which he had acquired from his conduct of the war. But his ambition being tempered with prudence and moderation , he wisely judged it better to rest satisfied with the glory which he had already gained , than to run the risk of exposing himself to reproach , by attempting what he knew to be impossible. He was better acquainted than any other person with the difficulties to be encountered

The time might come, he represented, when the confederates divided among themselves, and no longer supported by so powerful an ally as the king of France, might be induced or compelled to return to their allegiance; but while, through their dread of Spain, their internal union was preserved inviolate, and a prince so near them, possessed of such inexhaustible resources, ever ready to lent them his assistance; as it was absurd to expect to bring the war to the desired issue, so the consequences of persisting in it must prove equally ruinous to the dominions of the archdukes, and to the Spanish monarchy⁷.

 peace to the confederacy.

Albert, who entertained the most profound respect for Spinola's judgment, being now more firmly than ever persuaded, that peace was necessary, resolved, whatever construction might be put upon his conduct, to make the confederates an offer of it without delay. Having previously sounded their inclinations, by two persons of the names of Wittenhorst and Gevart, he some time after sent these men back to Holland, with instructions signed by himself and the infanta⁸.

These instructions they first communicated privately to several individuals, and afterwards requested to be permitted to lay them before the assembly of the states. The members were of different opinions with regard to the expediency of granting them this permission : and prince Maurice endeavoured to dissuade the states from granting it , by expressing his apprehensions that some insidious design was covered under the present proposal , and that as no treaty with Spain , or with the archdukes , while they were so entirely governed in all their conduct by the court of Spain , could be productive of any good effect , so the granting of a public audience to the commissioners would only serve to inspire the people with fallacious hopes of peace , and so damp their zeal in the prosecution of the war.

But Maurice yielded ⁹, on this occasion, to the persuasions of the celebrated John Olden Barnevelt, pensioner of Holland; one of the greatest statesmen of the age, and equally eminent for his public spirit as his political abilities and integrity. By this venerable patriot it was urged, that while the king of Great Britain stood an idle spectator of the war, and the French monarch seemed to have some great object in view, which he deemed of more importance than the support of the Dutch republic, both these princes were well pleased to observe the Spaniards exhaust their strength by an obstinate perseverance in the war with the Netherlands; and would probably be more liberal in their offers of assistance to the states than they had hitherto been if there were a negotiation begun for the establishment of peace. assembly, with Maurice himself, came readily into this opinion, and the commissioners were readily admitted to an audience. They represented that the archdukes, being desirous to put an end to the calamities of war, were ready to enter into treaty with them, either for establishing a perpetual peace, or a long truce, and would consent to such reasonable terms as they could not suppose would be rejected by the United Provinces. That the states could not be ignorant of the equity of the pretensions of the archdukes; that in all their conduct they had shown how averse they were to every severe and arbitrary measure in the government of their subjects; that they would claim nothing to which they had not the most unquestionable title; and that the states might assuredly depend on receiving from them every sort of satisfaction and security they could require for the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges.

To this proposal the states, after an interval of a few days, replied, that no regard could be paid to what the commissioners had delivered in the assembly, since the archdukes, it appeared, still persisted in supposing themselves possessed of a right to the sovereignty of the United Provinces. That in the solemn deed, entitled the Union of Utrecht, the states having, on the justest grounds, renounced the authority of the king of Spain, had asserted their liberty and independence; that this deed had been recognised by many of the European states and princes; that they had long maintained their liberty by force of arms; and were still determined to maintain it to the last extremity; and to reject every proposal for treating with the archduke or the king of Spain, either for a truce or a perpetual peace, unless they were acknowledged as a free state, over which these princes could pretend to no authority.

With this answer the commissioners returned to Brussels, from whence they wrote a letter to the states, acquainting them that, by the proposal which had been made, the archduke did not mean to claim any authority over them, or to introduce any change into their form of government; but, leaving all their laws and institutions on their present footing, to put a period to the miseries attendant upon war, by a peace or truce; and, soon afterwards, another commissioner was sent into Holland, in whom it should seem, Albert could put greater confidence than in his first commissioners. This person was Ney, or Neyen, a native of Antwerp, who had been educated in the Protestant religion, but having afterwards embraced the Popish faith, had resided for several years in Spain, and was at this time general of the order of Franciscans; a man of considerable learning, and of great integrity and abilities, and highly distinguished for his eloquence and address. Having been upwards of twenty years of age before he left the Netherlands, he retained a warm affection for his native country; he was at the same time animated with zeal to signalize himself in the service of the archdukes and the court of Spain, and undertook the task imposed upon him with great alacrity.

He had no sooner, after his arrival in Holland had an interview with some of the principal persons in the republic than he discovered that it would be vain to hope for success in the execution of his embassy, unless the states were in the treaty proposed to be acknowledged free and independent, and for this reason he immediately returned to Brussels, in order to convince the archdukes of the necessity of making this concession.

These princes, conformably to the tenor of the abovementioned letter, written by Wittenhorst and Gevart, at their desire, were willing to agree that no mention should be made in the treaty of their right of sovereignty, but expressly to disclaim this right, and formally to acknowledge the sovereignty of the states, they considered as equally dangerous and dishonorable. It would be in words to acknowledge what in their hearts they must disavow; it would be to give their sanction to rebellion, and thereby to afford encouragement to their subjects to imitate the example of the revolted provinces.

Being conscious, however, from the state of their finances, that they were utterly unable to carry on the war, they resolved, in conformity to the advice of their counsellors, to yield at least so far as to empower their commissioners to declare, that they were willing to treat with the confederates as with a free people, over whom they pretended to no authority: a form of expression which might be adopted they thought consistently with their honor, as it only denoted a matter of fact, but did not import either a renunciation of their own right to the sovereignty, or an acknowledgment of a right inherent in the states to independence.

In the hopes however that it might satisfy the confederates, Ney was immediately sent back to the Hague with a letter addressed to the states, and signed both by Albert and Isabella, of which the following were the principal contents: that being extremely solicitous to put a stop to the effusion of human blood, they were ready to treat with the United States as with a free people, from whom they claimed no submission or obedience: that they were willing to treat either for the purpose of establishing a perpetual peace, or a long truce, of twelve, fifteen, or twenty years, during the continuance of which the contending parties should retain what they at present possessed; unless it should be mutually agreed, for the common interest of both, to make an exchange of certain towns and territories: that, in order to prevent all suspicion of fraud or sinister intention, ambassadors, natives of the Netherlands, should be nominated by the archdukes, and an equal number named by the United States: that the states should have their choice of the time and place of meeting; and that while the negotiation was carrying on, there should be an entire suspension of hostilities for eight months, both by sea and land.

From the sequel it will appear that all the members of the states were not equally disposed to

B O O K agree to these proposals: but by a great majority 111. they were thought a sufficient ground for a nego-

No objection was made to the words in which the declaration of the independence of the republic was expressed. The states, conscious of the superiority of their naval force, refused to consent to the cessation of hostilities at sea; but they agreed that no hostile enterprise should be undertaken against any of the towns or provinces of the Netherlands, and no new forts erected. It was declared that the truce of eight months should commence on the fourth of May: and the archdukes engaged to procure a ratification of the present convention, including the declaratory clause, within three months, from the king of Spain ¹⁰.

This agreement having been first made with Ney, and a few days after confirmed in proper form by Albert and Isabella, was immediately communicated by the states general to the particular states, and a day of thanksgiving to Heaven for the prospect of peace appointed to be observed throughout the provinces.

The prospect

The people in general sincerely rejoiced on this occasion, and were greatly elated when they reflected on the proof which the proposal and concession of the archdukes afforded of the difficulties to which they were reduced.

¹⁰ Grotius, lib. xvi. Baudius, lib. i. Bentivoglio, lib. viii. and Meteren, lib. xxviii.

The war had now subsisted for almost forty years; and though, during a part of that time, only some of them had been much exposed to the calamities which are commonly attendant upon war, in the immediate scenes of action, yet most of them had experienced these calamities in some degree. They had, on numberless occasions, been disquieted with the most dreadful apprehensions; and they had long groaned under the weight of those enormous taxes, which the supporting of so many fleets and armies made it necessary to impose.

There was a considerable proportion however of the people whose interest and prosperity depended on the continuance of the war, and particularly those who held employments, which must either be suppressed, or rendered much less lucrative in the time of peace. By such persons peace was no less dreaded than it was desired by the generality of their countrymen, and the archdukes proposals were represented as deceitful and insidious. Unhappily many of the clergy joined in representing them in this light; and, by their inflammatory harangues from the pulpit, contributed to increase the difficulties which the states afterwards encountered in carrying on the treaty.

This negotiation was a matter of great surprise to the neighbouring states and princes. They could not suppose that the archdukes would have ventured to make such humiliating concessions, if they had not beforehand obtained the consent of the court of Spain; and that court, they thought,

 wholly unacquainted with the disorder that had taken place in the Spanish finances; but they could hardly believe that a prince possessed of such copious resources as those of Philip, could be reduced so low as to find it necessary to treat with his rebellious subjects on equal terms. They were therefore suspicious that the Spanish ministers had secretly formed some design, by which their interest or the interest of Europe might be affected; and they were confirmed in their suspicion,
 by reflecting on the secrecy with which the ne-gociation had been carried on. At Brussels it had been communicated only to a very small number of the archdukes ministers. At the Hague, the states general alone had been privy to it; and at both these places it had been carefully concealed from all the foreign residents, till it was made known by the states general to the particular states, when they appointed the day of public thanksgiving. These precautions gave a mysterious appearance to the conduct of both parties;
 yet they had probably been used with no other view, but either to avoid the perplexity arising from too great a multitude of counsellors, or to prevent opposition to the treaty in its infancy, and before the resolution was fully formed, whether it should be rejected or embraced.

Likewise an object of jealousy.

There were no princes so well entitled to be consulted on this occasion by the states as the kings of Great Britain and France, to whom the provinces had been so much indebted for their assistance in carrying on the war. The former of these princes, from the narrowness of his revenue, joined to his bad economy in the administration of it, had never been able to furnish them with pecuniary supplies: but notwithstanding the difficulties in which he was involved, he had consented that the one half of the money with which the French king supplied them, should be deducted from the debt which that prince owed to the crown of England, and had at all times afforded encouragement to their levies of troops in Britain; while he had secretly discountenanced those which, in consequence of the permission granted in the treaty of peace above-mentioned, were attempted by the archduke or the king of Spain.

The obligations, however, of the states were much greater to the French than to the British monarch; for Henry was not only more able, but more disposed to contribute to their support. Before the peace of Vervins, he had always considered their cause and interest as his own; and after that peace, had given them every proof of friendship that was consistent with fidelity to those engagements which he had come under to the king of Spain. His protestant subjects had been freely admitted to enter into their service, and had, every campaign, formed a considerable proportion of their troops. When, in order to procure tranquillity to France, he found it necessary to engage that he would not any longer afford assistance to the states, he had solemnly declared to the Spanish ambassadors, that he did not thereby mean to preclude himself from repaying those sums to the states, which they had lent him in the time of his distress. And, for some years, the repaying of these sums¹¹ was the only assistance in money which he afforded them. But after discovering that, in violation of the peace of Vervins, the court of Spain had formed intrigues with the Marechal Biron, and his other dissatisfied subjects, the object of which was the subversion of his government, thinking himself then at liberty to retaliate upon them for so great an injury, he had been more open and liberal than formerly in lending his assistance to the United Provinces. He spared no pains to persuade the king of England to enter into an alliance with him for their support; and had, yearly, advanced them sums of money for the payment of their forces.

It would be absurd to suppose, that in the kindness which Henry had manifested to the states, his conduct had entirely proceeded from motives of friendship and generosity.

It can seldom happen that a prince, in his conduct towards foreign states, could be justified for acting under the influence of such motives. A regard to the interest of his subjects, was, as it ought to have been, the ruling principle of Henry's conduct; and his liberality towards the United Provinces proceeded from his conviction, that on their prosperity, in some measure, depended the peace and tranquillity of his own dominions.

Having formerly suffered so much from the arms, and afterwards from the intrigues of the Spaniards, he was still disquieted with apprehensions of the danger to which he was exposed from their turbulent ambition. He had long beheld with pleasure their fruitless contest in the Netherlands, which had contributed so much to exhaust their strength. But having, in concert with some of his wisest ministers, formed a plan for the humiliation both of the German and Spanish branches of the Austrian family, which required leisure before he could bring it to maturity¹², he was not displeased to hear that the states had agreed to the archdukes proposals for entering into a treaty; but not having been previously consulted upon the subject, and the archdukes having made greater concessions than he expected, he dreaded that the court of Spain must have formed some deep insidious design, either against the states themselves or the princes in alliance with them; and therefore he resolved to bestow all that attention upon the present negotiation in the Netherlands, which a transaction of the highest consequence deserved.

His affairs in that country had hitherto been managed with great prudence by his resident, monsieur de Burerwall; but, being determined, if possible, to acquire a direction of the present negotiation, and vigilantly to watch over the conduct of the contracting powers, he sent to the Hague, in quality of ambassador extraordinary, the president Jeannin, a minister of great experience, who is equally celebrated in the annals of Henry's reign, and in those of his successor, for his fidelity, his eloquence, and his political abilities.

This able negociator had no sooner arrived than he required admission into the assembly of the states; where, after reminding them of the zeal with which his master had for so many years exerted himself in their behalf, he inveighed, with much severity, against those who had falsely accused the king of aiming at the sovereignty of the Provinces; and then gently reproaching the states with giving a color to this aspersions, by entering into a treaty with the enemy, without his knowledge or consent. But as no prince, he added, could more easily forgive his enemies; so there was none more ready to overlook the omissions of his friends: and, to prove the sincerity of his friendship for the states, the king had now sent him in the character of ambassador, with powers to assure them of the continuance of his assistance, in case a continuance of the war should be found expedient; or if they chose to put a period to it, to assist them in establishing an honorable and lasting peace. He concluded with requesting that a committee of the states might be appointed, to whom he might more particularly communicate his instructions, and with whom he might occasionally deliberate concerning the measures which it might be proper to pursue.

The states readily complied with this request, and expressed how sincerely they rejoiced to find so great a king disposed to take so warm an interest in their affairs.

This interposition of Henry gave equal uneasiness to the court of Spain, as it afforded joy to the states. They knew that all his influence would be employed, either to prevent an accommodation, or to render it derogatory to the honor and interest of Spain. And they were well acquainted with the superior talents of Jeannin, who, while he would keep the states perpetually on their guard, would encourage them to persist in their most exorbitant demands.

The courts of Spain and Brussels had reason likewise to look for opposition from the British, as well as from the French monarch. For James had no ground, they thought to entertain any jealousy of the Dutch; as their dependence on him for their English and Scotch troops, which formed so great a proportion of their army, his possession of the cautionary towns, which were so many keys of the Netherlands, the situation of his dominions, and the coincidence between his subjects and those of the states in religious opinions, seemed to render him secure of their alliance. It could not therefore but be agreeable, they imagined, to this prince, to contribute his endeavours, in the treaty of peace, to promote the interest of

B O O K the states at the expence of Spain. They supposed it, however, to be more likely that he might exert his influence to render this treaty abortive, from an apprehension which they had given him ground to entertain, that if Spain were at peace with the United Provinces, she might employ her leisure in fomenting the discontents of his popish subjects in Ireland.

The king of England concurs with the French monarch in promoting peace.

But they afterwards found that they had erred in this conjecture. Indolence, and an aversion to war, were predominant principles in the character of James; and these on this occasion determined him, in opposition to his political interest, to concur with the French monarch, in promoting the establishment of peace; besides that, he could not decently have attempted to dissuade the Dutch from listening to the proposals which had been made to them, without being more liberal than the narrow state of his finances would permit, in contributing to their assistance. James had been no less alarmed than Henry, by the intelligence which he received of the negociation between the states and the archdukes; and had expressed to Caron, the Dutch resident at London, his surprise at the secrecy with which it had been carried on. But the states, solicitous to preserve his friendship, having sent two of their number to explain to him the motives of their conduct, he readily admitted of their apology, and soon after sent sir Ralph Winwood and sir Richard Spencer, in the character of ambassadors, to assist them in bringing the treaty to the desired conclusion.

About

About the same time ambassadors arrived in Holland from the king of Denmark, the elector Palatine, the elector of Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, and several other protestant princes of Germany; who, having no interest of their own to adjust or secure, could have no other motive in sending them, but to afford to the states, on this important occasion, a proof of the concern which they took in their prosperity."

In the mean time an event happened, which, by elevating the hopes of one of the contending parties, while it depressed those of the other, contributed to hasten the treaty to a conclusion. The states having, early in the spring of this year, equipped a fleet of twenty-six ships of war, besides transports with stores and provisions, they put it under the command of Heemskirk, one of the bravest officers, and most skilful navigators in the Netherlands, with instructions to sail for the western coasts of Spain and Portugal, and by watching the motions of the enemy, to provide for the safe arrival of the East-India fleet. The preservation of this fleet, which there was ground to believe the Spaniards were prepared to intercept, the states informed him was to be considered as a principal object of his expedition; but they required besides, that he should give all possible annoyance to the enemy, and remember, that the archdukes having made proposals for a treaty of peace, the issue of this treaty, and consequently Heemskirk, flattered with the trust reposed in him at so critical a juncture, assured the states, when he received his instructions, that whether he should die or survive, they should not have reason to repent of the honor they had conferred on him; and, in order to express his confidence of success, he declared that he would not accept of any reward or pay, unless the booty should amount to more than five hundred thousand florins; in which case he would accept only of his share of what should remain after that sum was deducted. He was already, says Grotius, possessed of a greater fortune than his manner of life required; and, being animated more by the love of glory than of riches, under the simple show and moderate deportment of a citizen, he concealed all the qualities of a hero.

April 10. Having left the Texel on the 25th of March, he first directed his course towards Lisbon; but being informed on his arrival in the mouth of the Tagus, by some merchants whom he had sent before him, under neutral colors, to procure intelligence, that the first division of the Portuguese and Spanish fleet intended for the Indies and America, had already sailed, and that the ships belonging to the second, were neither fully equipped nor had got their cargoes on board; but that a Spanish fleet of ships of war was then riding at anchor in the bay of Gibraltar, he immediately set sail for that place, and soon arrived within sight of the enemy. B O O K

The Spaniards having, for several days, observed him steering his course along the coast of Andalusia, had given notice to the admiral Don John Alvarez Davila of his approach; and Davila had full leisure to put his fleet into a proper posture of defence. It consisted of twenty-one ships, nine of which were greatly superior in size to those of the enemy, and was drawn up under the cannon of the fort, having the admiral's galleon, which was much larger than the rest, in front. Heemskirk was fully aware of the great advantage which the Spanish admiral must derive from his situation; but this consideration rather served to confirm him in his purpose than to deter him from carrying it into execution.

For the greater, said he to his officers, in a council of war which he held before the engagement, the danger to which we shall be exposed, and the more arduous our attempt, the greater will be the glory we shall acquire, and the more important the service we shall perform to our country, if our arms shall be crowned with victory. Many illustrious exploits have our countrymen achieved in different quarters of the globe, but we are the first who shall adventure to attack the royal fleet in the strongest port of Spain; and, by our success, shall show how little reason the Spanish monarch, with his long proud list of titles, has to boast that he is the sovereign of the seas. Let us not be disheartened by the enormous size

B O O K of the enemy's ships, for this very circumstance,
 111. by rendering them unwieldy in all their motions,
 1607. will facilitate our conquest. I require you to do nothing, of which I shall not set you an example. But when the engagement shall be begun, we must remember it will be no longer possible to escape, we must either conquer or perish. Nor is it only our own preservation that depends on the fortitude we shall display in our present enterprise, but the safety of the rich fleet that is in its way from India, the safety of all our countrymen, who are engaged in trade in this part of the world, and the terms likewise of peace which the states shall obtain from the enemy. Let us only exert ourselves as we have done on former occasions, and discover that contempt of danger which is the surest pledge of victory, and we shall enjoy the glory and felicity of putting a period to the war, and thereby secure to our countrymen that liberty for which they have fought for more than forty years.

Having delivered these exhortations with that natural military eloquence, which he possessed in an eminent degree, and received from all the officers present, the most solemn assurances, confirmed by oath, that, to the utmost of their power, they would imitate his example, and fulfil his commands, he communicated to them his plan of attack, and, as soon as they had returned to their respective ships, he gave the signal to advance.

When Davila perceived them approaching, he ordered the master of a Dutch merchantman, whom he had a prisoner on board his ship, in chains, to be brought upon the deck, and inquired of him what he imagined might be his countrymen's design: to attack your fleet, answered the prisoner; to which Davila, smiling contemptuously replied, that he could not suppose it, since his single ship, he thought, would prove an over-match for all the Dutch vessels that were in sight. That may be true, said the other, but, either I know nothing of the character of my countrymen, or the battle will be instantly begun.

Heemskirk himself led the van, and steered his course directly towards Davila, who, instead of that contempt which he had so recently expressed, being now overwhelmed with astonishment at the sight of such unprecedented intrepidity, gave orders to slip his anchors, and to retire behind his other ships, hoping that the enemy would thus be induced to exhaust their fury upon them, and that afterwards he might come in for a share of the victory.

But Heemskirk, agreeably to his resolution, which he had communicated to his officers, that he himself would attack the admiral's galleon, without hesitation entered within the line of the Spanish fleet, and still continued to advance, keeping up his fire till he had come within musket-shot of the enemy. Davila having, before his approach, given the first broadside, it was now returned by Heemskirk, whose fire being more skilfully directed, did greater execution. But soon after, while this gallant seaman stood giving orders, on the having recommended himself to the Divine Mercy, and appointed an officer of the name of Verhoeve

Death of Heemskirk.

So great a disaster was calculated to fill the minds of the spectators with dismay and terror;
 but that intrepid spirit with which his example had inspired them, far from being extinguished by his death, was rather nourished up into rage and fury, by their desire of taking signal vengeance on the enemy. The battle, which had been suspended for a little while, was instantly renewed with the same vigor as before; and another captain,
 called Lambert, coming up to support Verhoeve,
 they united together in their assault on the Spanish admiral's ship, and battered her at once on both sides with uncommon violence.

In the mean time the rest of the Dutch fleet
 had begun their attack upon the other galleons, with the same alacrity and ardor; and the Spaniards long gave proof of equal bravery in their defence. But at length, two of their ships were set on fire and burnt by the enemy, a third was sunk, a fourth, from some accidental cause, blew up, and all the rest, except the admiral's galleon, run ashore. BOOK

The admiral himself had been killed about the same time with Heemskirk, but the officer who succeeded him in the command, had maintained the combat with inflexible fury, and the issue for several hours remained doubtful. At length, a third Dutch ship arriving to the assistance of the other two, the Spanish commander hoisted a white flag, as a signal that he was ready to surrender.

But the Dutch, animated by the same implacable and vindictive spirit, with which their war against the Spaniards had generally been conducted, paid no regard to this signal, and still continued firing till they had beaten down the flag. The hearts of the Spaniards then sunk within them, and their efforts began to relax. The Dutch perceiving this, instantly boarded their vessel, and attacked them with so much fury, that they were quickly overpowered. Most of them were put to the sword, and the rest compelled to jump over board into the sea, where many of them were either shot or drowned. In this engagement the Spaniards lost near two thousand men; and, besides the ships above-mentioned, which were burnt or sunk, almost all the rest were rendered unfit for future service; whereas not a single Dutch ship was either lost or destroyed, and only about a hundred men were killed.

So signal a victory, which excited the most dreadful apprehensions in the minds of the people along the southern coast of Spain, might have

B O O K been attended with the most important consequences, if Heemskirk had lived to improve it; and either Cadiz or Gibraltar might have been reduced. But the officers, on whom the command had devolved, were satisfied with the glory they had acquired, and, in two days after the engagement, retired to Tetuan, on the African coast; from whence, after repairing their damages, and sending home two of the transports with the sick and wounded, and the body of the admiral, they sailed in different squadrons to the coast of Portugal, Azores, and other places, where they expected to enrich themselves by the capture of the merchant-ships.

But although this victory was not attended with any new conquest, it had considerable influence on the temper and conduct of the contending parties at the present crisis. It contributed to inspire the Dutch with greater confidence of success in the prosecution of the war, and to render them more intractable; while it tended, on the other hand, to produce a more complying temper on the part of the Spaniards, and to heighten their solicitude for the establishment of peace.

Effects of this victory
on the contending parties.

The archdukes had given the most convincing evidence how strongly they were actuated with this solicitude. They had not only made the first advances to the states, and readily agreed to preliminary terms, which, by all the powers of Europe, were thought humiliating; but no sooner had a cessation of hostilities been agreed to, which extended only to hostilities at land, than they set at liberty, without a ransom, all the Dutch failors, who had been taken prisoners by their ships of war, and showed themselves determined, if possible, to put an end to every species of hostility.

These princes had, from the beginning, taken too little pains to save appearances, and had suffered their eagerness for peace to betray them into an act of indiscretion, which, by putting the states more than ever upon their guard, tended to increase the difficulty of accomplishing their design. Their agent having, agreeably to his instructions, requested a private interview with Aersens, the Dutch secretary, after returning him thanks for his good offices with the states, desired him to accept of a diamond of considerable value for his wife, and acquainted him that the archdukes, deeply impressed with a sense of his good intentions, had given orders for the restoration of his house in Brussels; while the marquis of Spinola had sent him an obligation for fifty thousand crowns, fifteen thousand of which should be paid upon demand, and the rest as soon as either a peace or a long truce should be concluded. Aersens, having conjectured what might be Ney's intention in wishing for an interview, and having previously consulted prince Maurice concerning the part which he should act, accepted, though with seeming reluctance, both of the diamond and Spinola's obligation for the money; but, agreeably to his concert with Maurice, he delivered them up to the council of state, to

Eagerness of the archdukes
 for peace encourages the Dutch to insist on high terms.

This transaction, therefore, served only to excite suspicion of the archdukes designs; while it afforded a striking proof how extremely averse they were to the continuance of the war, and thus contributed to confirm the states in their resolution of insisting upon the most advantageous and honorable terms.

The court of Spain was not in reality less anxious with regard to the issue of the present negotiation than that of Brussels; but, whether from pride or policy, they better concealed their anxiety, and artfully acted for some time as if the treaty had been entirely the plan of the archdukes, to which the king found himself under no necessity, arising from the situation of his own affairs, of yielding his consent.

Of the truth of this, their conduct, with regard to the ratification of the late agreement between the states and the archdukes, affords sufficient evidence. In order to obtain that ratification, Ney, the Franciscan, had gone to Madrid, and, after a delay of several weeks, during which he had occasion for all his address and eloquence, he had now returned with it to Brussels. It was immediately after carried to the Hague by Verreiken, Albert's principal secretary; to whom the states, impatient to know particularly the contents of his instructions, granted an audience on the next morning after his arrival. They had been beforehand informed, by a letter from Spinola, that their agreement with the archdukes had been ratified by the king, and that it was in order to communicate to them the deed of ratification that Verreiken was sent into Holland. But they were extremely dissatisfied when they examined this deed, both with the form and the contents.

It was conceived in vague and general terms, and not in the common form of a compact or convention. It did not comprehend the essential clause relative to the sovereignty and independence of the United Provinces. Even in the copy of the archdukes agreement, which was prefixed to the deed, that clause was omitted; and, in contradiction to the spirit and meaning of it, the archdukes were styled the sovereigns of the Netherlands. It was subscribed by Philip, "I, The King," (Yo el Rey) a form of subscription which he used only where his subjects were addressed. It was sealed with his small seal, instead of the great one; and it was written on paper, and not on vellum, as was usual in all transactions of importance.

These omissions and informalities were instantly perceived by all the deputies; but, that their conduct might not appear precipitate, they appointed another meeting for the mature consideration of them; after which they unanimously resolved to reject the deed of ratification, as being neither such as the archdukes had undertaken to procure, nor affording a sufficient ground for proceeding in the intended treaty. Verreiken, to whom this

B O O K resolution was communicated, labored to persuade
III. the states that the defects and informalities com-

 lessness on the part of the transcriber, it being impossible to doubt that the king would have entirely rejected the agreement, if he had not meant to grant his ratification of the whole.

But the states remained inflexible in their purpose; for it was equally impossible, they thought, to suppose that a deed of so great importance, in the consequences of which not only the archdukes, but the king himself, were so deeply interested, could have been left by his ministers to be devised by an inferior clerk or secretary. It was impossible but his ministers must have perceived the want of so essential a clause as that which related to the independence of the provinces; a clause which was obviously of such a nature, that it was impossible to doubt of its having been purposely omitted, but without which they were unalterably resolved to decline all farther negotiation, either with the archdukes, or with the court of Spain.

Verreiken, perceiving that no arguments he could employ would prove effectual, requested liberty to remain at the Hague for six days longer, till he should acquaint the archdukes with what had passed, and receive their instructions for his future conduct. With this request the states complied; and, before the expiration of the time specified, a letter from the archdukes arrived, in which they engaged, that, though they could not perceive the validity of these objections which the states had made to the form of the king's ratification, who thought, that, as he had ratified a part of the convention without objections to the rest, the deed ought to be considered as a ratification of the whole; yet, in order to remove every obstacle to the treaty proposed, and to show how sincerely they desired the establishment of peace, they would procure another ratification in the form required: but, in the mean time, they hoped, and requested, that the states would give proof of sincerity on their part, by recalling their fleet from the coasts of Spain.

On this occasion a violent contest arose among the deputies, and several of them discovered an inclination to break off the treaty without delay. It was now sufficiently manifest, they alledged, that the Spaniards were not sincere in their professions. It was absurd to expect that an enemy, so inveterate and implacable, would ever seriously think of peace on fair and equitable terms, till they were compelled by some dire necessity. It was evident that their object had, from the beginning, been to disarm the confederates, and to procure a respite from the war, till their preparations for prosecuting it with greater vigor were complete. The fleet, therefore, ought not to be recalled, but to be reinforced, and the people roused from their present lethargy, by apprizing them of the snare which had been laid for their destruction.

These were not, however, the sentiments of the greater part of the deputies; for although the whole assembly were disposed to ascribe duplicity and artifice to the court of Spain, only some of them thought there was any ground for calling in question the sincerity of the archdukes, who, in the opinion of the generality, had, to the utmost of their power, fulfilled their engagements, and could not be justly blamed for the defects or informalities of the ratification.

It was therefore resolved, partly from the respect due to these princes, and partly from dread of the imputation of insincerity in the professions which they had made of their desire of peace, that the fleet should be recalled. But they, at the same time, required that the ratification, executed in proper form, should be produced within a limited time specified; and, in order to prevent any future omission or error, they delivered to Verreiken three copies, precisely of the same import, one in Latin, another in French, and a third in Dutch declaring, that, without a faithful transcript of one or other of these, they would instantly break off the negociation, and apply themselves to the prosecution of the war.

It was Barnevelt who made this declaration, in the name of the other deputies; after which he reminded Verreiken of the attempt which had been made by the Franciscan to corrupt the secretary. "There," said he, "is the diamond, and here is the marquis of Spinola's obligation for fifteen thousand crowns. Let them both be restored to their proper owners: such presents are not necessary for the purpose of obtaining peace, if your masters wish for it, on equitable terms; and if they are not willing to agree to such terms, their presents will not be sufficient to procure it. Were it possible that one or two persons could be found in this assembly so base as to accept your bribes, and, for the sake of them, to make a sacrifice of the liberty of their country, yet a great majority will retain their integrity, and render your largesses, though they were much greater than your masters can afford, of no avail¹⁵. ”

Verreiken, being unprepared for this attack, was thrown into some confusion, and replied, that “Ney must certainly have done what he was accused of without any authority from the archdukes.” It was impossible that the states could give credit to this assertion; but, being satisfied with having so publicly expressed their resentment, the meeting was immediately dismissed, Verreiken permitted to return to Brussels, and soon after the fleet was recalled.

The archdukes, at the same time, renewed their applications at the court of Spain; and at length, though not without considerable difficulty, obtained such a ratification of their convention from the king as they hoped the confederates would accept.

In this new deed all the same clauses were inserted, which the copies transmitted by the states contained, and nearly the same form of ¹⁵ Grotius and Baudius.

BOOK expression was observed; but to the declaration
 111. that the king and archdukes were willing to treat 1607. with the confederates as with a free people, over whom they pretended to no authority, a clause was annexed, declaring, that in case the negocia-tion should be broken off on account of religion, or any other disputed point, the ratification should be void, and all matters remain on their present footing. Besides which, the deed was incorrectly written, some words being interlined, and others wholly omitted. It was written in Spanish, and not in Latin, French, or Dutch, as had been requested; upon paper, and not on parchment, and subscribed like the former one, not with the name of the king, but with the words "I, The King," as if Philip had still considered the confederates as his subjects.

These latter circumstances, though they afforded a proof of extreme carelessness, or of the most childish obstinacy, on the part of the Spanish ministers, were deemed of small importance; and it was proved that even the king of England; in his late treaty of peace with Spain had acquiesced in the same form of subscription. But the deputies could not be so easily reconciled to the clause annexed to the declaration of their liberty;
 for although, as they represented to the arch-dukes commissioners, they were free, whether the king of Spain should acknowledge it or not, yet the annexed clause seemed to imply that their freedom depended on the will of the king; and to accept of the ratification with a clause of this import, might be interpreted as an acknowledgment, on their part, of the truth of the position which the clause implied. Besides that, from the manner in which mention is made in this annexed clause, of religion, and other disputed points, there was ground to suspect, that, in the treaty proposed, the king intended that the establishment of religion, and other matters which respected the internal government of the provinces, should be discussed.

To this the people of the United Provinces would never be persuaded to consent. To insist upon it, would be to treat them as a dependent, and not as a free people; and, therefore, to the states it appeared extremely doubtful, whether, in order to save a great deal of unnecessary trouble, it were not expedient that the negociation should be instantly broken off. But, as they should be sorry to give ground to suspect that they were not desirous to put a period to the calamities of war, they had resolved to refer the whole matter to the states of the particular towns and provinces, that the people might have an opportunity of judging for themselves in a matter in which they were so deeply interested. With this answer the commissioners returned to Brussels, after receiving an assurance from the states, that, in seven weeks from the present time, information would be transmitted to the archdukes whether the ratification was rejected or received ¹⁶.

Disputes and parties in the United Provinces.

At this juncture, both the people and their rulers differed widely in their sentiments with regard to the question that was now before them; while one party maintained that the ratification ought, without hesitation, to be rejected, and the other thought, that although it was not altogether such as they wished it to have been, yet it ought to be admitted as a sufficient foundation for the treaty that was proposed. Prince Maurice was at the head of the former of these parties, and Barneveldt of the latter; and each of these leaders exerted himself with great activity and zeal in gaining converts to his opinion¹⁷. There was ground to suspect that the motives by which the prince was actuated, on this occasion, were not perfectly pure and disinterested, but that he dreaded the diminution of his power, if peace were established, and, partly on this account, was desirous of the continuance of war. The reasoning, however, which he employed, was specious, and made a strong impression on the minds of many of his countrymen.

As the court of Spain, he said, had on former occasions given the most unquestionable evidence of their duplicity, so at present it was impossible to doubt of their being actuated by some sinister design. In their first ratification, they had not only declined to acknowledge the independence of the states, but had expressly affirmed, that they were subject to the dominion of the archdukes. To their second, they had subjoined a clause which rendered their independence contingent and precarious, and wholly dependent on the will of the king. Whoever considers the vast dominions of Spain, and her inveterate habits of domination and pride, would not be easily convinced that she intended to observe a truce, or peace, any longer than it might suit her views of tyranny and conquest. It was the design of that ambitious and politic nation, to break the spirit of the confederates by the habits of indolence and luxury. The martial spirit would leave the republic, and would not be easily revived. The citizens would become remiss and inattentive to the defence of objects, which, when they knew them to be in danger, they considered as dearer than life. None are so easily subdued as those who think they have nothing to fear. The fear of the enemy is a bond of unity, and produces both military discipline and civil obedience, while states living in security, opulence, and ease, are subdued by habits of effeminacy, torn by intestine discords, and thus fall an easy prey to some ambitious and warlike neighbour. It was for this reason, that Scipio Nasica opposed with so much wisdom, the false policy of Cato, who advised the destruction of Carthage.

When the minds of the confederates should cool, and their patriotism begin to languish, the Spaniards hoped, by various arts of corruption, to bring them again under the yoke of their former sovereigns. But whatever might be the effect of such artifices, they would recruit their exhausted strength, and whenever a fit opportunity should offer, violate the peace they now solicited.

Their army, at the present period, was universally discontented on account of their want of pay. Great numbers had already mutinied; and if the war continued, there was ground to expect, that the greatest part would refuse to submit to the control of military discipline. With such an army, no prudent general would venture to engage in any important enterprise. And the people, among whom they were quartered, being grievously oppressed, both by the government and the mutineers, were ready to shake off a yoke which had become intolerable.

The Spaniards were still less formidable at sea than at land. From the great decrease of their trade, they found it impossible to procure sailors sufficient to man their ships of war; and their fleets, far from being able to contend with those of the states, were even unable to defend themselves in their harbours, under the cannon of their forts.

Such was the present state of the Spanish fleet and army; whereas those of the confederates had never been in so flourishing a condition. Their army was at present, as it had always been, under the most perfect discipline; regularly paid, and abundantly supplied with every thing necessary to enable it to act with vigor: while their fleets, more numerous than ever, had in almost every quarter of the globe proved an overmatch for those of the enemy; and had obtained over them several important victories, which had been attended with a great increase of trade, and wealth, and power. They had established trade in many places, which, till lately, had been visited only by the Spaniards and Portuguese. They had got possession of several of the most important branches of the Indian commerce; and if they did not suffer themselves to be diverted from the prosecution of their naval enterprises, they would ere long make themselves masters of the whole. The war, therefore, which they had carried on against the enemy at sea, had already proved, and would still continue to prove, a mine of gold to the United Provinces; while their military operations at land, had neither exhausted their riches nor their strength. Their army in a great 1607. manufactures and trade, and all the money expended for the support of the army, was spent at home, either in purchasing the manufactures of the country, or those commodities which merchants found it so beneficial to import from foreign parts. It had indeed been found necessary to impose taxes on several commodities; and many persons complained of the burden of these taxes, yet both the riches and the number of the people had every year increased, since the taxes were imposed; and no country abounded more in the necessaries and conveniencies of life.

Of the truth of these observations, the Spaniards were sufficiently aware. They had come at length to perceive that the war had to the confederates proved a copious source of prosperity; while their own strength had been exhausted by it, and their commerce almost ruined; and they were for this reason desirous of a temporary peace, hoping thereby to avert the danger to which they saw themselves exposed; to deprive the confederates of the advantages which they at present enjoyed; to sow discord among the provinces, and to accomplish, by fraud and artifice, what they had hitherto been unable to attain by force of arms. That such was their intention, appeared from the dissingenuity of their conduct with regard to the deed of ratification.

But whether this was in reality a design or not, no doubt could be entertained that, as it was for the interest of the Spaniards that peace should be established, it was no less for that of the states that the war should be prosecuted with vigor, till the enemy were reduced to the necessity of acting with greater sincerity, and more equitable terms could be obtained, than they had ground to expect at the present period.

This reasoning produced the desired effect, chiefly in Holland and Zealand, where the people were conscious, that their prosperity had been in some measure owing to the war; while their situation rendered them more secure against its attendant calamities, than the inhabitants of the inland provinces. But the reasons on the other side, which were urged by Barnevelt, were generally thought to be more deserving of attention and regard.

There was too much ground, he allowed, for the imputation which had been cast upon the court of Spain, of insincerity in their conduct, with regard to the deed of ratification. It was evident, from the manner in which they had acknowledged the independence of the States, how extremely reluctant they had been in granting that acknowledgment. The clause annexed to it, declaring that in case the negotiation should be broken off, the ratification should be void, ought not to have been inserted. It was even unnecessary to insert it for any purpose which the Spaniards could have in view, because, in every treaty, the validity of any particular concession, must depend on the event of the treaty, and if it prove 1807. of this clause, it could not be inferred that the court of Spain had formed any insidious design. Their reluctance to acknowledge the independence of the states, might justly have been expected; and the little pains which they had taken to conceal it, afforded a strong presumption that their intentions were sincere.

But although they should in reality intend to violate the peace which they now solicited, was this a sufficient reason for refusing to treat with them, or for declining to accept of a peace upon equitable terms? Ought peace to be rejected in every case, where it was possible that the conditions of it might be violated? Ought states to live in perpetual war, because there was ground to apprehend, that they might not be able to maintain a perpetual and uninterrupted peace; If the Spaniards shall hereafter revive their claim of sovereignty over the provinces, will this claim derive any validity from the present treaty, in which they have so explicitly renounced it? Will they not then justly expose themselves to the reproach of having acted with duplicity; and is it not the natural tendency of such a conduct, to increase the number of their enemies, while we shall then, as well as now, be possessed of arms to maintain our liberty, and have the same or more numerous friends to assist us in counteracting their tyrannical designs?

Great disorders, it was true, prevailed at the present period in the Spanish monarchy: the royal navy had suffered a considerable diminution, and the archdukes army was extremely ill paid and mutinous. But although this consideration might justify the states in demanding the most advantageous terms of peace, it would not justify them for resolving to persist, at all adventures, in the prosecution of the war. From negligence and inattention, but chiefly from the folly of engaging at once in too many difficult and expensive enterprises, Spain was weakened; but it would be madness to proceed on the supposition, that her strength was spent, for she was still possessed of inexhaustible resources; and nothing but greater prudence and moderation were requisite to render her formidable to all her enemies. During the last campaign, she had exerted herself more vigorously than several years preceding, and if the rivers that year had not been swelled to an unusual height, her troops might have penetrated into the heart of the provinces. She might still continue, and perhaps redouble her exertions; and if she was incensed, as she would justly be, in case the states should obstinately refuse to treat with her, she might be determined to direct her whole attention against the dominions of the states, and put forth a degree of strength which they would be unable to withstand.

Their arms had hitherto been attended with greater success, than could justly have been expected against so potent an enemy; but of all

B O O K human events they should remember those of war
 III. were the most fortuitous. The republic had in 1607. former periods been brought so low, that the states would gladly have submitted to the sovereignty of a foreign prince: and one unfortunate campaign, or the loss of a fleet, which depended for its preservation on the mercy of the winds and waves might again reduce them to the like desperate condition.

They had been enabled to attain their present prosperity, by the friendly assistance of the queen of England, and the king of France; but the former of these princes, who had long been their principal support, was dead, and her successor either not so able, or not so willing to assist them; while the latter was far advanced in years; was desirous, for reasons which could not be easily penetrated, to have the war brought to a conclusion; and although during his life, they might trust that he would not suffer them to be oppressed, yet he might ere long leave his kingdom to an infant son, during whose minority, the Spaniards were likely to have greater influence over the French counsels, than the United States.

The great object, as well as the end of war was peace; and advantageous terms of peace could never be so easily obtained, as when the enemy found it necessary to apply for it, in order to retrieve the ruined state of his affairs. The object of the present war had, from the beginning, been to shake off the yoke of the Spanish government, and to assert their liberty. This object was now secured, and the king of Spain himself was ready to treat with them as with a free people, over whom he pretended to no authority. Could they be justified in their own eyes, or could they be justified in the opinion of the world, if they should refuse to treat with him? Would the pretext that he was insincere in the acknowledgment which he had made of their independence, and that possibly he will hereafter revive his claim, and refuse to fulfil his engagement, afford a vindication of a conduct so singular, so haughty, and contemptuous? Was the war to be prosecuted till they had accomplished the dissolution of the Spanish monarchy? Was this an event either to be expected or desired? Were the people of the United Provinces to be the only people on earth, who were never to enjoy the blessings of tranquillity?

The war indeed had been the occasion of prosperity to some, who ought to rest satisfied with the advantages which they had already derived from it: but to great numbers, it had often been a copious source of distress and misery. Many groaned under the burdens which the war had made it necessary to impose; and many lamented the loss of their friends, and the ruin of their fortunes, which are the inseparable concomitants even of the most successful war. It was surely desirable to put a period to these calamities; and if they did not embrace the present opportunity of doing it, provided it could be done consistently with their honor, and their future security, they would be answerable for all the blood that should

B O O K be spilt, and could not be justified in the sight

This discourse, which was delivered in an extraordinary assembly, where deputies from all the provinces and almost all the towns were present, deriving weight from the character of the speaker, as well as from the solidity of the reasoning which it contained, was listened to with great attention; and, while it produced conviction in the minds of the greater part, it imposed silence upon the rest, and extorted their consent to the measure which it was intended to recommend. Prince Maurice, supported by the deputies from the province and towns of Zealand, proposed that the form of an explicit and unconditional acknowledgment of their independence should be transmitted to the archdukes, to be subscribed by them as a preliminary article; but this motion being rejected as harsh and offensive by a great majority, it was at length resolved to appoint ambassadors for the purpose of negotiating peace; and notice of this resolution was immediately sent to the court of Brussels ¹⁸.

Dec. 24th.

It was at the same time proposed to the archdukes that the conferences should be held at the Hague, which for some time past had been the seat of government in the United Provinces; and, in order to induce them to comply with this

propofal, it was fuggested, that, as the ambaffadors of the ftates could not be invefted with very ample powers, they might often have occafion to confult their conftituents; and if any other place of meeting, or any town within the territories of the archdukes were made choice of, much time would be loft, and the negociation be unneceffarily prolonged.

The archdukes, follicitous to avoid every caufe of delay, readily agreed to this propofal, and immediately appointed for their commiffioners the marquis of Spinola, Mancidor, a Spaniard, their fecretary at war, Richardot, the prefident of their privy council, Verreikens, their private fecretary of ftate, and Ney, the Francifcan, to whole activity and addrefs they thought themfelves much indebted for having brought the negociation thus far.

The commiffioners appointed by the ftates were nine in number, feven of whom were nominated by the feven provinces, and the remaining two by the ancient body of the nobles. Thefe two were count William of Naffau, a near relation of prince Maurice, and Walraeve, lord of Brederode; and thofe appointed by the feveral provinces were among the moft refpectable perfons in the commonwealth: but the confidence of the people of all ranks, at this important crisis, was chiefly placed in Barneveldt, who was nominated commiffioner by the province of Holland.

This virtuous and able ftatefman was indefatigable in his attention to every ftep of the prefent negociation; and, before the conferences were

B O O K begun, he devised an expedient admirably calculated to promote the end in view. The predominant passion in the minds of his countrymen was still, as it had been for many years, suspicion of the intentions of the court of Spain. It had been chiefly from this quarter that he encountered so much difficulty in persuading them to agree to the archdukes proposals of a conference; and he still dreaded that the same cause might prevent this conference from being attended with the desired effect. This distrust of the Spaniards he apprehended would show itself on every occasion, and on the slightest grounds; and it would be carefully fomented by prince Maurice and others, who wished for a continuance of the war. In order, therefore, to quiet the apprehensions of the people, to deprive the prince and his partisans of a pretext, of which he knew they would readily lay hold, and at the same time to intimidate or overawe the Spaniards, he proposed to the French and British ministers that, before the conferences were opened, their masters should enter into a new alliance with the states; that they should engage to employ their endeavours to procure for them an equitable peace; and, in case of their procuring it, should farther engage to afford them such assistance as should be necessary for maintaining it inviolate.

This proposal did not meet with the same favorable reception from the British as from the French monarch. Though James was determined by the motives above explained to concur with Henry in promoting the establishment of peace; yet, having ground for doubt whether the interest of his own dominions did not rather require that the war should be continued, he was never so deeply interested, as he desired that the states should believe, in the success of their present negotiation¹¹. Besides that, he knew how much it was in the power of the Spaniards to disturb his tranquillity by their intrigues with the Irish Catholics, and was therefore unwilling to incur their resentment. Influenced by these considerations, he declined at this time to enter into the proposed alliance. But Henry more decided in his conduct, and less afraid of the consequences of giving offence to the court of Spain, readily yielded his consent, and sent orders to the president Jeannin, to finish the treaty without delay.

 the establishment of peace, they from thence perceived that it was become necessary for them, and therefore resolved, if possible, to procure the French king's assistance in their negotiation with the states. For this purpose, but under a different pretext, the marquis of Villa Franca was sent to Paris, in the character of ambassador, and from that time Henry acted as mediator between the contracting powers, although it was well understood how much more he favored the pretensions of the Dutch than those either of the archdukes or the king of Spain²⁰.

required, as a preliminary article, a solemn acknowledgment, in the name of the king of Spain and the archdukes, of the independence of the United Provinces, including an explicit renunciation of all right to authority over them; together with an obligation, binding on their successors as well as on themselves, that they should not henceforth use the arms or titles of the provinces, or any other marks of their ancient sovereignty.

The commissioners of the archdukes were much offended at the latter part of this requisition; and, besides remonstrating against it to the Dutch commissioners themselves, they bitterly complained to the British and French ambassadors, of the arrogance discovered in making so unusual a demand. It had been the ordinary practice, they observed, of princes to retain the titles of the states or kingdoms which they had lost. The Catholic king was styled king of Jerusalem, and duke of Burgundy; the king of France called himself king of Navarre; and the king of England still assumed the title of king of France. In requiring his Catholic majesty therefore to renounce his titles as well as his sovereignty, the states were not only guilty of arrogating to themselves the privilege of introducing a new practice, but of impeaching the conduct of the greatest sovereigns in Europe, and particularly of the kings of France and Britain, who had no less reason to be offended at the demand of the Dutch commissioners than the king of Spain.

The French and English ambassadors, however, declined on this occasion to interpose, and the archdukes commissioners, after having obtained the consent of the archdukes, acquainted those of the states at the next meeting, that they were ready to grant the renunciation required in its full extent. The Dutch were agreeably surprised at the facility with which the Spaniards thus yielded to their request; but when Richardot, who was the speaker on this occasion, added that, in return for so liberal a concession, it was expected that the states would agree to abstain for the future from all commerce in the Indies, and rest satisfied, as they had done till about ten years before, with the trade which they had carried on with Spain, and other countries in Europe, they were inflamed with indignation, and exclaimed, that one moment the king and archdukes acknowledged them to be a free and independent people, and the next showed they were determined to treat them as slaves, and, if possible, to deprive them of the most valuable branches of their liberty: that these princes, in renouncing their claim to the sovereignty of the provinces, had given nothing to the states which they did not possess before; while, in requiring them to relinquish their trade to India, they, in effect, required them to abandon what was known to be a principal source of their wealth and power: but they declared that no consideration would ever induce them to comply with a demand which was equally exorbitant and unjust; for, under what pretext could the Spaniards claim the exclusive privilege of trading to the Indies? Those countries were not the property of the Spaniards, but belonged to a great number of independent princes, many of whom chose rather that their subjects should engage in trade with the Dutch than with the Spaniards or Portuguese. Those countries were likewise of an immense extent; they could furnish materials for trade to all the commercial nations in Europe; and it was a violation of the law of nature, and contrary to the general good of mankind, for any one nation to endeavour to engross the whole. The states would not refuse to agree to any arrangement with regard to the Indian trade, which was calculated to promote the mutual interest of both nations. But, having been reduced by the Spaniards themselves to the necessity of having recourse to this new branch of commerce, having begun it in the face of difficulties, which it had required an enormous expence, and the most vigorous exertions to surmount, having established a company for carrying it on, and already tasted of the profits arising from it, they were determined, whatever should be the consequences, to persevere. The Spanish commissioners had no other reply to make to this answer of the states, but that the Spaniards and Portuguese had long been in the sole possession of the trade to India, and that the king of Spain had not only refused to grant a participation in that trade to the French and English, but likewise to his well affected subjects in the Netherlands: but no regard was paid to these considerations by

BOOK the commissioners of the states; and they were
 III. confirmed in their purpose by the unanimous voice 1608. of their countrymen, joined to a representation which was made on this occasion to the states by the India company.

The trade, they represented, with Spain and Portugal, had never been, and could never be productive of any advantage to individuals or to the public, equal to that which arose from the trade to India. In this, and the other branches of foreign trade, of which the Spaniards wanted to deprive them, upwards of a hundred and fifty ships and eight thousand sailors were employed. These ships were all of a considerable size, and might at any time be converted, at a small expense, into ships of war, when the public exigencies should require. The Indian trade was not only infinitely more profitable than the Spanish, as it consisted in going to the fountain-head for those commodities, which they had formerly purchased at second hand from the Spaniards and Portuguese, but was likewise much more safe and certain, because it did not, like the other, depend on the caprice of the king or of the ministers of Spain. They had formerly experienced how little they had to rely on the trade with Spain and Portugal. Their sailors had been seized and imprisoned, or sent to the galleys to work as slaves, and their ships and goods had been confiscated. It would be always in the power of the Spaniards to exercise the same oppressions. They would renew them under various prettexts, on the slightest grounds of offence; and after having persuaded the states to abandon their Indian commerce, they would next exclude them from that of Spain and Portugal, in the hopes that by thus reducing their naval power, they might again compel them to submit to their authority. The states might judge of how much importance the trade of India was to the Spaniards, from the eagerness which they discovered to prevent any other nation from partaking in it; but it was of still greater importance to the people of the United Provinces, who depended almost entirely upon that trade for their subsistence, and, without the resources which they derived from it, would be utterly unable to maintain their liberty and independence. Nor was it interest only which the states would sacrifice, by granting the request of the Spanish commissioners, but likewise their integrity and honor; since alliances had been formed with the Indian princes, and some of these princes, trusting to the protection of the company, acting by the authority of the states, had shaken off the yoke of the Spaniards, and thereby exposed themselves to their severest vengeance, if, by any article in the present treaty, the company were to be prevented from fulfilling their engagements.

The states were more than ever determined, by these considerations, to reject the request of the Spanish commissioners; but, that they might afford some proof of the sincerity of their desire of peace, they gave them their choice of the three following proposals. The first, that, conformably to the ordinary tenor of treaties of peace, both parties should equally enjoy the liberty of commerce by sea and land. The second, that the united Provinces should abstain from all commerce with countries under the government of Spain, on this side of the northern tropic, while, on the other side, all matters should remain on their present footing; the states being satisfied that peace should take place on this side, while hostilities, if unavoidable, might continue on the other. And the third, that Spain should give no molestation to the Dutch in India for seven years, before the expiration of which a new treaty should be set on foot, in order to devise some proper means of accommodation. The Spanish commissioners replied, that they were not possessed of power to agree to any of these proposals. They knew that the king of Spain had renounced his sovereignty over the provinces, in the hope of their consenting entirely to desist from the Indian trade; but they should appoint one of their number to go to Madrid for new instructions. The Franciscan was accordingly dispatched for that purpose; and, in the mean time, the commissioners proceeded to take some of the other points in question under their consideration.

The Dutch having, from the beginning, suspected, on account of the mention of religion in the king's second ratification, that it was intended to propose some change in their established religion, required of the Spanish commissioners to declare whether they had received any instructions on that head, and what their instructions were. The commissioners acknowledged that they were indeed instructed to make a proposal to the states with regard to religion : but added , that they could not enter on the discussion of this article till several others had been discussed. Of all the articles they knew , there was none in which the king and the duke of Lerma were so deeply interested ; but since their arrival in Holland , they had come to be persuaded , from private information , that no proposal which they were empowered to make on this subject would be listened to by the states. They were likewise afraid that the discussion of a point of so delicate a nature , on which the passions of the Dutch would be so easily inflamed , might occasion a sudden dissolution of the conferences ; and from the sequel , it is probable that they had sent the Franciscan to Madrid as much for the purpose of sounding the inclinations of the court , and knowing their ultimate resolution on this head , as on that of the Indian commerce. Although they were repeatedly urged , therefore , by the Dutch to declare what they were instructed to propose with regard to religion , they as often declined complying with their request , and insisted that it was better previously to examine the other questions in dispute.

One of these related to the duties which , during the war , had been laid by the Dutch on all goods imported by the Scheld to Antwerp. The archdukes commissioners insisted that all those duties should be taken off : nor were those of the states unwilling to abolish such of them as had been imposed in consideration of the war; but they required that the same duties should still be paid by the subjects of the archdukes and the king of Spain as were exacted from the subjects of the states, to enable them to defray the expense of the fortifications on the banks of the Scheld, and of the ships of war that were necessary for the protection of their commerce. This was the pretext which they employed, although it is probable they were chiefly actuated by their dread lest the trade of Antwerp should be revived to the prejudice of that of their own commercial towns in the maritime provinces.

III.

Another point which engaged the attention of the commissioners, regarded the mutual exchange of those towns and districts which the contending powers had acquired by conquest from one another. The states were at this time in possession of Sluys, and the isle of Cadzant in Flanders, and of Breda, Bergen op Zoom, and Gertrudenburg, in Brabant; all of which places were of the first importance, on account of their situation and strength. The Spanish commissioners, however, proposed and urged that these places should be given to the archdukes, who were sovereigns of the provinces in which they lay, and that the states, in compensation for them, should accept of Oldenzael, Groll, and Lingen. But the Dutch commissioners rejected this proposal with great disdain, alledging that the towns possessed by the states were of infinitely greater value than those which were offered in exchange for them; and declaring, that as no concessions which the archdukes would make were a sufficient equivalent, both parties, agreeably to what the archduke had proposed in the beginning of this negotiation, should retain what was at present in their possession.

A third question related to the boundaries between the dominions of the states and those of the archdukes; a fourth, to the restitution of the effects belonging to individuals which had been confiscated; and, besides these, there were several other matters treated of, concerning which the opposite parties contended with great warmth, and discovered a wide diversity of sentiment.

Many weeks past in fruitless altercation. The parties seemed to be more than ever exasperated against each other; and the difficulties which prevented them from coming to an agreement seemed daily to increase.

The Dutch were extremely tenacious of their claims, and the archdukes commissioners often complained of this obstinacy to the English and French ambassadors; but their conduct was, at the same time, explicit and undisguised; and, from the commencement of the negotiation, they had openly declared, that, whatever concessions they might be induced to make in other matters, there were two points, religion and the trade to India, on which no such concession was to be expected as the Spaniards were likely to require.

To procure some new instructions with regard to these important articles, had, as already mentioned, been the purpose for which the Franciscan had been sent to Madrid. The time fixed for his return was expired, and no satisfactory account of his delay was given by the archdukes commissioners, who studiously avoided all discourse concerning him, and maintained an obstinate silence with regard to his success.

The Dutch were exceedingly disgusted at this behaviour: they knew not to what cause it could be ascribed: they were not without suspicion of some insidious design: and they at length resolved, that either the archdukes ambassadors should give them satisfaction concerning the cause of Ney's delay, or that the treaty should instantly be broken off.

Having, accordingly, in the most peremptory terms, required to know what was the ultimate determination of the king of Spain with regard to the Indian trade, the ambassadors, thinking it unnecessary any longer to conceal what they knew, replied²², that Ney had not been able to obtain a more favorable answer to his application than this, that the king, from his ardent desire of restoring peace to his dominions, was still ready to renounce his claim of sovereignty over the provinces in the form proposed; but, in return for so great a sacrifice, required that the states should abstain from all commerce to the Indies, and permit the exercise of the Catholic religion throughout the whole extent of their dominions.

Of this declaration the deputies of the states gave immediate information to the states general, and the English and French ambassadors. James having lately entered into that defensive alliance with the states which he had formerly declined, and Henry, besides concluding such an alliance, having empowered ²¹ Jeannin to acquaint them, that, in case the present treaty were not broken off without his consent, he had resolved to assist them in the prosecution of the war; both these princes were well entitled to be consulted on the present occasion. Henry could not decently have neglected the opportunity, which was presented to him, of interposing in behalf of the religion which he professed, and therefore he had instructed Jeannin to advise the states, if possible, to grant to their Catholic subjects the indulgence which Philip had demanded for them; but he did not insist on their compliance with his advice: he was sensible that this indulgence might endanger their internal peace, especially if it was granted at the request of the king of Spain; and therefore left them at liberty to determine, both with regard to religion and their Indian trade, whether any concession could be made consistently with their interest and security.

The states themselves unanimously thought that there was no room for hesitation on the subject. With the consent of Jeannin, as well as of the English ambassadors, they rejected the conditions

B O O K that were proposed; and, at the next meeting with
 III. the archdukes commissioners, it was declared by 1608. those of the states, that they considered the insisting upon these conditions as a violation of the promise which had been made of treating with them as with a free people; that they could not consider the conduct of Spain as consistent, fair, or candid, and were therefore determined to break off the present treaty; and, without suffering themselves to be any longer deceived, to resume the prosecution of the war²⁴.

The states seem to have received sufficient provocation on this occasion for the resentment with which they were inflamed; but, from a letter of the president Jeannin's to the king of France, it appears that it was not the court of Spain so much as the archdukes commissioners, of whom they had reason to complain. For Philip, it appears from this letter, had, from the beginning of the negociation, declared that he would never consent to renounce his sovereignty, but on the condition that the free exercise of the Catholic religion should be established in all the provinces; and he had charged the commissioners to open the conferences by acquainting them that this was his unalterable resolution. But the commissioners had thought it expedient to change the order of their instructions, and to begin with an acknowledgment of the freedom of the states, hoping thereby to render them more obsequious in other articles; and afterwards, when both parties were in better humor with each other, to obtain from Philip some relaxation in his demand with regard to the Catholic religion²⁵.

III.

This information was communicated to the deputies of the states, and afterwards to the states general, with an intention to sooth their resentment; but it served rather to turn it into another channel, by directing it against the archdukes commissioners instead of the court of Spain. And it likewise served to rivet their conviction, that no solid peace could ever be obtained from that court, whose bigotry was the same in the present as it had been in the former reign, without a concession on their part, which they deemed to be no less contrary to good policy than it was inconsistent with sincerity in their profession of the Protestant faith. They were confirmed, therefore, in this resolution of declining to proceed any farther in the treaty, and seem to have satisfied the English and French ambassadors, that they had sufficient motives to justify their conduct.

These ambassadors, however, still believed it to be practicable to restore tranquillity to the United Provinces, although not by a perpetual peace, yet by a long truce between the contending powers. The obstacles to the establishment of peace had chiefly arisen from the pride and bigotry of the court of Spain; but these obstacles, they thought, might be more easily surmounted in attempting to conclude a truce than a peace, ²⁵ Negociations de Jeannin, tom. ii. p. 403, 404, &c.

BOOK because, if only a truce were concluded, that court
III. might flatter themselves with the hopes, that, at 1608. the expiration of it, they might recover their concessions, and accomplish the several objects in which they were so deeply interested; besides that, there was ground to suspect, that, from the beginning of the negociation, it was a truce, and not a perpetual peace, that was intended by the Spanish ministers.

The president Jeannin admitted to an audience of the states.

The president Jeannin having previously concerted with the English ambassadors certain preliminary articles, without which he knew that all farther treaty must prove abortive, requested an audience of the states, and, being admitted into their assembly, after expressing the concern of the French and English monarchs on account of the unsuccessful issue of the late conferences, he added, that these princes, being deeply impressed with a conviction of the necessity of putting a period to the war, had, in case it should be found impracticable to establish a lasting peace, commanded their ambassadors to recommend to the states a truce of several years, provided that such a truce could be obtained on advantageous and honorable terms. For, in recommending this measure, he subjoined, it is, by a regard for the true interest and honor of the provinces, that the French and British kings are prompted, and therefore they exhort you to adopt it only on the following conditions: first, that the king of Spain and the archdukes shall treat with you as with a free people, over whom they pretended to no authority; fecondly, that, during the truce, you fhall enjoy a free commerce both in Europe and in the Indies; and, thirdly, that you fhall retain all the towns and territories which are at prefent in your poffeffion.

During this truce you will have leifure to rectify the diforders which have fprung up during the continuance of the war, to pay your debts, to reform your government, to extend your trade, and, if you ftudy to maintain internal union and tranquillity, this truce, it is probable, will terminate in a lafting peace, by which the advantages you have obtained will be perpetuated and fecured: whereas, if at this time the war were to be renewed, we forefee innumerable difficulties to which you will be expofed; and perceive, that, in order to infure fuccefs, your friends muft be much more liberal in their affiftance, than is convenient for them in the prefent fituation of their affairs.

You are diffatisfied with the conduct of your adverfaries; but let not your refentment prevent you from liftening to the counfel of your friends. It is our intention to offer them the fame counfel; and, if they refufe to follow it, to acquaint them that the kings of France and Britain are determined to give you every proof of faithful friendship in their power. But in return for this, thefe princes expect that you will not, by your obftinacy, engage them in a war to which they are utterly averfe, and for which, if this truce can be accomplished, there is no neceffity.

1608.

It will be difficult, we know, to obtain the consent of the Catholic king to the preliminary articles; but, if that prince shall be found equally uncomplying and intractable, as you have hitherto experienced, and the treaty for a truce, like that for peace, shall, through his fault, prove abortive, you will be justified for again having recourse to arms; and the princes too, whom we represent; will be justified for resolving to exert themselves with greater vigor in your behalf²⁶.

To this proposal the states general made no immediate reply, but that they would submit it to the consideration of the states of the particular provinces.

It was soon after communicated to the marquis of Spinola, and the rest of the archdukes commissioners, by whom it was received with all the satisfaction which might be expected from their well known aversion to the continuance of the war. But although they acknowledged how much pleasure it would give them, if any means of an accommodation could be devised, they dreaded that the archdukes would be unable to persuade the court of Spain to agree to the preliminary articles; and, for this reason, they labored to persuade Jeannin to omit the two first articles altogether, and to attempt to conclude a truce without any other condition but that both parties should retain what they possessed. It had been with the utmost reluctance, they represented, that the king of Spain had formerly consented to acknowledge the independence of the states, even when he expected thereby to gain some concession from them in favor of the Catholic religion; and to exclude them from the Indian trade, had been his principal motive for desiring to put a period to the war. To procure his consent, therefore, either to the first or to the second of the preliminary articles, would be attended with difficulties, which, there was ground to apprehend, would be found insuperable; and no other agreement was like to be obtained than a cessation of hostilities, or a truce in the common form, during which both parties should retain what was at present in their possession.

Jeannin was sensible of the truth of this representation, and foresaw the difficulties which the archdukes must encounter, if they listened to his proposal; but, besides that these princes were, above all things, solicitous to be delivered from a ruinous war, which filled their minds with perpetual disquietude, and would employ all their influence to overcome the pride and obstinacy of the court of Spain, he knew that the Spaniards were at present extremely ill prepared for the commencement of hostilities, and hoped that on this account they might be induced to agree to terms, which, on another occasion, they would have rejected with disdain.

He would not, therefore, have been inclined to withdraw the preliminary articles, even although he had found himself at liberty; but they were a part (he said) of the archdukes pledged either to procure the acceptance of them

by the archdukes and king of Spain, or to furneceſſary for the proſecution of the war. This declaration he made to the archdukes commiſſioners in the moſt explicit terms; and added, that while it might be difficult to obtain the king of extremely doubtful whether theſe conditions were ſuch as would ſatiſfy the people of the United believe that nothing leſs than was contained in the preliminary articles would give ſatiſfaction either to them, or to their friends.

Of the truth of this aſſertion, as far as it regarded the confederates, there was immediate proof in the difficulty which Jeannin encountered in perſuading them to agree to his propoſal.
The greater part of the deputies of the particu-

preliminary articles, and gave their opinion that the truce, with the conditions contained in theſe articles, ought not to be refuſed. But there were many, who, whether from motives of pri-deſirous of a continuance of the war, maintained that no agreement whatever ſhould be made, but on condition that the archdukes, and the king of

The former of these parties was headed by Barneveldt, supported by the French and English ambassadors; and the latter by prince Maurice, whose opinion was espoused not only by the whole province of Zealand, over which his authority was almost without control, but by the deputies of Amsterdam, and those of several other cities in the province of Holland.

The former endeavoured to persuade the latter, that it was unreasonable to expect the same liberal concessions from the enemy, in the case of a truce, as where a perpetual peace was to be established; and that, while the states were conscious of being free and able to maintain their liberty, it was of no importance whether the Spaniards should acknowledge, or refuse to acknowledge, their independence; for it was sufficient for every valuable purpose which they could have in view, if the Spaniards would treat with them as with a free people, and conclude an agreement upon equitable terms.

Parties for and against

But these considerations had no weight with prince Maurice, or his partisans. They were averse to the truce on other accounts, besides their objection to the declaratory clause, and labored to convince their countrymen that a truce, on whatever terms, at the present period, though it might be necessary for Spain, must prove pernicious and dangerous to the Dutch republic. They omitted no opportunity of inculcating their opinion, whether in public assemblies or in private societies, and published innumerable letters and pamphlets, which being universally perused, became the subject of discourse in every company. Of these writings some were of the most inflammatory kind, intended to instil suspicions into the minds of the people, that Barnevelt and his friends, unable to resist the allurements of Peruvian gold, had sold their country to the Spaniards; and even the French and British monarchs, it was insinuated, by so earnestly recommending the truce, intended rather to serve the court of Spain than the United Provinces. Their suspicions on this head were heightened by the arrival at Paris and London of two ambassadors, who had been sent on their present embassy by the Spanish ministers, though under a different pretext, yet, probably, with no other view but to procure the good offices of James and Henry in the present negotiation in the Netherlands.

No pains were spared by the French and English ambassadors at the Hague, to convince the Dutch that their apprehensions were without foundation. Above all the rest, Jeannin labored assiduously for this end; and by giving the deputies of the states the strongest assurances that his master's friendship was inviolable, and that nothing could be more remote from his intention than to enter into an alliance with Spain to the prejudice of their republic, he seems, with regard to this matter; in which they were so deeply interested, to have set their minds at ease.

The aversion, however, of a great number of them to the truce, and their animosity against such of their countrymen as promoted it, were as strong as ever. Their resentment was principally directed against Barnevelt, who, by his eloquence and address, his great abilities, and long experience, had acquired an entire ascendant over most of the deputies: he appears, however, to have been too sensibly affected on this occasion by the odium to which he found himself exposed. Having one day bitterly complained, in an assembly of the states, of the cruel treatment which he received in the libels daily published on the subject, of the present controversy, he appealed to the deputies, whether he had given just ground for such injurious imputations as had been cast upon him; and then left the assembly with a resolution to retire from public life. But he soon recovered his tranquillity; and, at the earnest desire of the states, he returned to the assembly, and afterwards continued to apply himself to the conduct of public affairs with the same indefatigable attention as before ²⁷.

It would be injurious to the character of prince Maurice to suppose that he would demean himself so far as to be concerned in those anonymous pamphlets and incendiary letters, replete with

²⁷ Grotius, &c. lib. xvi

BOOK III. 1608. threats against Barnevelt and his adherents, which were published on this occasion. He took no pains to conceal his resentment, and openly inveighed against their conduct, as being calculated to involve the provinces in ruin. Having visited several of the towns in Holland, he labored to bring over the deputies to his opinion, and with the same intention he wrote a circular letter to all the other towns in the province.

What he said and wrote on this occasion was principally intended to inspire the deputies with mistrust of the archdukes and the court of Spain, whose conduct, in the present negotiation, he said, had been inconsistent with their professions in the beginning, and who could not have any reason for declining to grant the most explicit renunciation of their right of sovereignty over the provinces, but that they secretly designed to assert that right when a more convenient season should arrive.

They would observe the truce only so long as they found it necessary for retrieving the ruinous condition of their affairs; and, mean while, the people of the United Provinces, deceived by a false appearance of tranquillity, would not only quit their arms, but would lose their military spirit, and be induced to agree to whatever terms should be prescribed to them, rather, than again expose themselves to the dangers or inconveniences of war.

The Spaniards, it was evident, being utterly averse to a perpetual peace, hoped to be able,

during the truce, to apply some effectual remedies to the disorders which prevailed in their finances; whereas the states having so great a number of frontier-towns, where numerous garrisons must be maintained, would have nearly the same expenses to defray as during the continuance of the war. It would, however, be infinitely more difficult, after their apprehensions of immediate danger were removed, to persuade the people to pay the taxes which it would be necessary to impose; and the enemy would, at the same time, practise on their fidelity, and sow the seeds of discord among the different towns and provinces, of which they would not fail to avail themselves, without thinking it incumbent on them to delay hostilities till the expiration of the truce.

As this reasoning of prince Maurice coincided with the prejudices which the Dutch had, for many years, entertained against the Spaniards, it made a strong impression on the minds of many of the deputies; nor was it considered either by Barneveldt or Jeannin, as frivolous. On the contrary, they treated it with the respect which was due to the person by whom it was employed, although they, at the same time, labored assiduously to show that the arguments on their side had greater weight; and Jeannin, in his own name and that of the other ambassadors, presented a memorial to the states, of the following purport, intended to remove the objections that were urged by Maurice and his adherents.

" The princes whom we represent, being deeply interested in your prosperity, and believing the truce proposed, to be necessary, in the present situation of your affairs, are therefore much concerned to observe the opposition which it meets with from so many respectable members of your state.

" You ought not, they alledge, to be satisfied that the archdukes and the king of Spain are willing to treat with you as with a free people, over whom they pretend to no authority, but you ought to require a declaration that they will consider you in this light for ever afterwards, as well as during the continuance of the truce.

" But in the opinion of the princes, our sovereigns, your liberty is equally well secured by the former of these declarations as by the latter; because the former, not being limited to any particular time, but expressed in terms that are general and indefinite, it must be understood by all the world in the same sense, as if the words " for ever " were subjoined. Besides this consideration, it is not of the king of Spain and the archdukes, that you are to hold your liberty. You have long maintained that you are already free, having asserted your liberty by a public solemn deed, founded upon reason and necessity, and bravely defended it for many years against your oppressors, by the force of arms. You ought, therefore, to rest satisfied with that simple acknowledgment of it, which is implied in the declaration of being ready to treat with you as with a free people. You would be satisfied with such an acknowledgment from any neutral or friendly power. You have equal reason to be satisfied when it is made by the archdukes, and the king of Spain. And you ought not, with so much solicitude, to require these princes to be more explicit, in declaring you to be free, lest you be considered as thereby tacitly confessing that still they have a right to your obedience.

“But, even allowing, that the king of Spain should not think himself excluded by the form of words made choice of from his claim of sovereignty, will he call you before a court of justice, do you suppose, in order to have his rights examined by the rules of law? It is not in this manner that sovereigns assert their claims; it is only to the sword that they appeal: and if you be able when the truce expires, to maintain your liberty as you have hitherto done against the force of arms, you will then, as well as now, with justice despise your enemy’s pretensions to dominion over you. It will be sufficient then, as it is at present, to find yourselves in actual possession of your liberty. And, in whatever sense the words of the truce may be understood by the king of Spain, you ought to be satisfied with the assurance which has been given you, and which we now repeat, that, by the princes whom we represent, whose friendship you have so long experienced, and on whose assistance you may with confidence rely, these words are considered as a clear and unambiguous declaration, that you are a free people over whom authority cannot ever be justly pretended by the king of Spain.

"It is farther objected by those who oppose the truce, that it will afford leisure to the catholic king to retrieve the ruinous condition of his finances, and to prosecute the war, after the recommencement of hostilities, with greater vigor. Nor can it be denied, that if he was to listen to the advice of wise and faithful counsellors, it might be, in some measure, attended with this effect. But is it to be presumed that a young king, at the head of a nation noted for restless and inordinate ambition, with ministers inattentive to economy, when the exigencies of his affairs required it, will be more attentive when his situation renders it unnecessary? Is it not rather to be presumed, that his treasure will, more than ever, become a prey to the avarice or profusion of his ministers? that it will be more than ever lavished on idle pomp and show; or that, by quarrelling with his neighbours, he shall ere long be engaged in some ambitious and expensive enterprize?

"It is from your republic, and not from the king of Spain, that those prudent measures may be expected, which are necessary to repair the mischiefs that have been occasioned by the war: you are equally distinguished for your private and your public economy; and you are not less distinguished for your industry, your activity, and enterprize. With these qualities, which you possess in so eminent a degree, your trade must every year be more extended; and, being carried on with smaller risks, and at less expense, the profits arising from it will be greater than ever. You will thereby be enabled to discharge your public debts, to relieve your people from the load of taxes under which they groan, and, when the truce expires, to prosecute the war with less dependence on your allies, and a greater probability of success.

It will still, indeed, be necessary for you to maintain garrisons in the frontier-towns, and to retain a considerable proportion of your troops in pay, that, whether the truce be observed or violated, you may be always found in a proper posture of defence.

“But at least the one half of your army may be disbanded. Your trade will, in the mean time, be carried on with much greater advantage than hitherto, and all those losses by sea and by land avoided, which you have so often represented to the kings, our masters, as the cause why you were unable, of yourselves, to defray the necessary expenses of the war.

“But your enemies, it is alledged by the opposers of the truce, will have access during the continuance of it, to carry on their intrigues among the people; to sow dissensions among the towns and provinces, and to persuade some of them perhaps to abandon the confederacy; while the people themselves, delivered from the apprehensions of immediate danger, will refuse to pay the taxes which the states shall find it necessary to impose.

“With regard to these objections, as we do not pretend to any certain foresight of futurity,

we will not affirm that they are entirely destitute of foundation. There is no state of human society that is not subject to inconveniencies and dangers; and there are dangers attending peace as well as war: but the dangers mentioned are such as, with prudent precautions, it is in your power to avoid. The objections founded on the apprehensions of them are equally applicable to a peace, as to a truce; and if they are sufficient to deter you from listening to our proposal of a truce, they ought to determine you to persist in the prosecution of the war, till you have accomplished the utter ruin of your enemy. But you are too wise to propose to yourselves an object inadequate to your strength. And, therefore, unless you chuse to live in perpetual war, which must much sooner prove the ruin of your republic than of the Spanish monarchy, you must, sooner or later, agree to bring the war to a conclusion, either by a peace, or by a truce. A peace on the terms which you require, is at present unattainable; and even although it were in your power to procure it, yet, in the opinion of many of your friends, a truce is more desirable. For it is a sort of medium between peace and war, and it might prove dangerous for you, before your political institutions have acquired that stability which time alone can bestow, to pass at once from the one extreme to the other. It might occasion too great a relaxation of the vigor which you have been so long accustomed to exert, and expose you an easy prey to the resentment of your enemy.

“But during the continuance of the truce, you will look forward to the expiration of it. By keeping your fortifications in repair, and your troops under proper discipline, joined to a prudent administration of your finances, you will provide for that event; and thus, when the Spaniards shall perceive that you are well prepared for your defence, they will more easily agree to those equitable terms of peace, which at this time their pride and their sense of shame have determined them to reject.

“The example of the Swiss cantons, whose fortune so nearly resembles yours, ought to engage you to listen to the counsel which we offer. Like you, they had thrown off the yoke of their oppressors, and their arms had generally been attended with success; yet they agreed to a truce, when proposed to them, on much less advantageous terms than those which you are exhorted to accept; and, during the leisure which it afforded them, they put their civil government and their military establishments on so respectable a footing, as effectually determined their ancient masters to lay aside the thoughts of a farther prosecution of the war. From the same conduct it is likely that you will derive the same advantages. The king of Spain will more easily consent on equitable terms, to a truce than to a perpetual peace, because he may think that his dignity will suffer less from making temporary than perpetual concessions: but many circumstances, it may be presumed, will concur to deter him from a renewal

BOOK of hostilities. His animosity and resentment will
 III. be abated; his ancient sovereignty over you will 1608. be, in some measure, obsolete and forgotten: having tasted the sweets of tranquillity, he will desire to preserve it undisturbed: he will have experienced that it is the interest of his subjects at home, and still more of those in the Indies and America, to live at peace with you. And, as it will be impossible, unless you be greatly wanting to yourselves, but that, some years hence, you must be possessed of greater resources than at present, he must perceive the danger of engaging in war with you, after your power is established and confirmed; when he considers, that in the very infancy of your state, his most vigorous efforts to reduce you to obedience were of no avail.

“What has been said will be sufficient, it is hoped, to evince that the objections against the truce, which have been urged by its opposers, ought not to deter you from agreeing to it, in case the consent of the king of Spain can be procured to the terms proposed. These objections indeed are urged by some of the most respectable members of the state, whose zeal for the prosperity of the republic is unquestionable. But the wisest men are subject to error. It may be true, that some inconveniencies may arise from the truce, but it should seem that much greater are to be dreaded from a continuance of the war. And, it is a first principle of prudence, of two evils to make choice of the least.

“Before we conclude this memorial, it is necessary to remind you of two things, which deserve your attention. First, that it is not only the counsel; but the earnest request of those princes, to whom you have been chiefly indebted for assistance, that you should adopt the measure we have recommended: and, secondly, that so favorable a concurrence of circumstances as the present, for obtaining equitable terms of accommodation, may never again occur. The archdukes are princes on whose fidelity you can with safety rely for the punctual performance of their engagements: they are fond of peace; at their earnest entreaty, the king of Spain hath already made, and is still likely to make more ample concessions than could otherwise have justly been expected; and in conducting the treaty proposed, you will have all the assistance that can be given you by two powerful monarchs, who consider your interest as their own.”

This memorial did not immediately produce the desired effect upon all the deputies. Several of the towns in Holland, and the whole province of Zealand, with prince Maurice at their head, still remained as averse to the truce as ever; and Maurice still continued to employ his influence to confirm them in their resolution of opposing it. By his emissaries, and his letters, he attempted

BOOK to gain over the other towns and provinces to his 111. opinion. He sometimes talked as if both the 1608. French and British monarchs were pursuing their private interest, at the expense of the republic. He insinuated that, unless they should drop the proposal of a truce, and immediately agree to assist the states more liberally than hitherto in prosecuting the war, the more distant parts of the provinces ought to be abandoned, and the territories of the republic contracted within such narrow limits, as might be defended by the forces which the Dutch themselves, without foreign assistance; were able to support. He alledged, that no matter of so great importance as was at present under deliberation, could be adopted without the unanimous consent of all the towns and provinces: and threatened, that the province of Zealand, if forsaken by the other provinces, would alone maintain the war against the Spaniards, till more ample concessions were obtained ²⁹.

The French monarch could not avoid feeling some resentment at his conduct, which he considered as equally violent and injurious. But Henry's candor would not suffer him to divest himself of that esteem which he had long entertained for the prince's character; nor to believe the suggestions of his enemies, that he was actuated by some sinister design. He still wrote to him as to a friend whom he highly respected, sparing no pains, and employing every argument to engage him to adopt his views.

Henry's

²⁹ Jeannin, tom. iii.

Henry's endeavours were well seconded by Jeannin, who acted with the most consummate prudence, and carefully avoided giving any personal offence to prince Maurice, while he exerted himself with great activity in counteracting his designs. By the eloquence and address of Barnevelt, joined to the influence which he derived from his great experience, and the high opinion which was justly entertained of his public spirit and integrity, Amsterdam and all the other towns in Holland were reconciled to the truce, on the terms proposed; and not long after, prince Maurice and the province of Zealand, with whom Jeannin and the English ambassadors, assisted by deputies sent thither by the other provinces, assiduously employed all their influence, were persuaded to relinquish their opposition.

The archdukes were employing in the mean time their interest at Madrid to obtain the consent of Philip; who, from the beginning, had discovered no less reluctance to Jeannin's proposal than prince Maurice or the province of Zealand. Far from being averse to a truce, this prince was exceedingly desirous that it should take place, provided it could be concluded on the ordinary condition of both parties retaining what was at present in their possession. But to acknowledge the independence of his rebellious subjects, and formally to grant them his permission to carry on their trade in India, were conditions with which he himself and many of his subjects thought it ignominious to comply.

The archdukes endeavoured to convince him, that in making these concessions, they would do nothing more than had been already done in consenting to the suspension of arms, and that no more important consequences could arise from it. They engaged to have the article relative to the Indian trade expressed in such a manner, that it should not materially affect the interest or the trade of Spain.

They represented, that the declaration so earnestly required by the United States, could not do any prejudice to the king's right of sovereignty, that it could not remain in force but while the truce subsisted, and that the Hollanders would find it of no avail, after the renewal of hostilities, if his majesty's arms were crowned with victory. They added that this was the opinion of the ambassadors of the mediating powers, and likewise of many members of the states of the revolted provinces, who opposed the truce on account of the insignificance of the clause which contained the declaration of their liberty.

These considerations, urged by such powerful solicitors, had great weight with Philip, who would have yielded his consent, provided that some concession could have been obtained in favor of the Catholic inhabitants of the United Provinces. And he had some ground, he thought, to entertain the hope of being able, in some measure, to accomplish this object, in which he was more deeply interested than in any other, when he considered that the prince who was the chief mediator in the present negociation, was himself a Catholic. But the archdukes having informed him, that Jeannin, whose zeal for the Popish faith was unquestionable, had declared that it would be in vain to attempt to introduce any proposal concerning religion among the preliminary articles, Philip doubted whether he could enter with a good conscience into any treaty with such determined heretics; and therefore hesitated, for some time, whether he should not utterly reject the truce, whatever consequences might follow.

In order to dispel his scruples, the archduke sent to Madrid his confessor, Ignatio Brizuela, a Spaniard of noble birth, eminently distinguished for his piety and virtue, and of great experience in the affairs of the Netherlands.

Brizuela knew well how to make impression on the timid, superstitious mind of Philip; and judiciously employed religion itself as a motive, which should induce him to comply with the archdukes request. If in the course of the treaty, said he, any indulgence can be procured for the Catholic inhabitants, the French ambassador will exert his most strenuous endeavours in their behalf; but it is necessary, he added, even for the interest of religion, that the truce should be concluded, lest, considering the difficulties under which the archdukes must labor in resuming the war, instead of re-establishing the Catholic faith in the rebellious provinces, it shall be exposed to danger in those which have been brought back to their allegiance.

To this reasoning, Philip listened with great attention, and seemed to be in a great measure satisfied, that he ought not any longer to withhold his consent; but chose, as usual, before he gave an explicit answer, to hear the opinion of his favorite the duke of Lerma. The duke had not, it should seem, as yet formed a decisive resolution with regard to the part which it would be most prudent for him to act on the present occasion. He had long experienced the most insurmountable difficulties in furnishing the necessary expenses of the war; and he dreaded, if it were not speedily brought to a conclusion, some great disaster might happen in the Netherlands, which would not be ascribed to the marquis of Spinola, who had so often given the most unquestionable proofs of military prudence and capacity, but to him, by whom that general had been disappointed in the supplies and reinforcements which had been promised him. For this reason, and perhaps too as was suspected by his cotemporaries, from his jealousy of Spinola, who had rendered himself of so great importance as to rival him, or at least to enjoy too large a share in the royal favor, he had from the beginning been extremely intent on the establishing of peace. Observing, however, that both the pride of the Spanish nation, and Philip's superstition, were alarmed by the concessions demanded by the states, he had not ventured to advise a compliance with their requests. But it would be much easier, he was persuaded to reconcile the Spaniards to the truce, than to a peace, as the concessions to be made in the former were not to be perpetual; and Philip's religious scruples being in a great measure removed, by what the confessor had represented to him, he laid aside that hesitation and reserve with which he had hitherto acted; and uniting his influence to that of Brizuela, and of several other Spanish ecclesiastics, who were devoted to his interest, he soon persuaded Philip to grant his ratification of the preliminary articles. It was immediately transmitted to the archdukes, accompanied with a recommendation, to avoid, if possible, the consenting to an express permission of the Indian trade; and, if possible, likewise to procure some indulgence for the Popish inhabitants in the United Provinces³⁰.

During the confessor's stay at Madrid, the French and English ambassadors were employed in preparing at the Hague the several articles of the treaty. And as the archdukes commissioners had some months before, at the desire of the states, who dreaded their secret practices among the deputies, returned to Brussels, the negotiations between the mediators and them had hitherto been carried on by letters.

But as this method of conducting it was attended with the most tedious delays, Jeannin in his own name, and that of the other ambassadors, proposed to the archdukes that they should send their

BOOK commissioners to meet with them at Antwerp.
 III. This proposal was readily complied with and 1609. both parties arrived in that place in the beginning of February 1609.

The ambassadors had brought with them a copy of the articles of the truce, of which they had obtained the approbation of the states; and they had engaged, that unless the archdukes commissioners should adopt it without any material alteration, within eight days after their arrival in Antwerp, they should break off the conferences, and decline all further negotiation on the subject. Both the archdukes and Spaniards, they knew, were at present utterly unprepared for the renewal of the war, and nothing, they believed, would contribute so much to quicken their resolutions, as the dread of its being instantly renewed.

But when the resolution of the states was communicated to the Spanish or archdukes commissioners, they complained that their matters were rather used unhandsomely, and represented that the time allowed was too short for the dispatch of business of so great importance. The ambassadors were sensible of the truth of what they said, and obtained the consent of the states, to prolong the time; after which both parties began seriously to apply themselves to the discussion of the several articles of the treaty.

Against the fundamental article, which regarded the liberty and independence of the revolted provinces, the commissioners offered no objection, except to the title assumed in it by the states, of High and Mighty Lords , which they so obstinately opposed , that instead of the terms high and mighty , the ambassadors were obliged to substitute the word illustrious. An article relating to contributions , amounting yearly to 300,000 crowns , which had been paid to the Dutch , by the inhabitants of the open country in Brabant , in order to procure an exemption from being plundered , was the occasion of much altercation. The states very unreasonably required that these contributions should be continued during the truce But the mediators , having represented to them the injustice of this request , and that the levying of contributions was equivalent to a continuance of hostilities , they at length consented that the article should be expunged , and in return for this concession , the archdukes agreed to yield to them some extensive districts adjoining to Bergen-op-Zoom , Breda , and other places , in the possession of the states , upon condition that such of the inhabitants of these districts as were Catholics should be indulged in the free exercise of their religion.

A proposal was made for a mutual exchange of towns , which the contending parties had lately conquered from each other ; but as the conquests of the Dutch had been much more important than those of the archdukes , no expedient could be devised , to which the former thought it their interest to agree : and for this reason , it was at length determined that both parties should retain the towns at present in their possession. The

B O O K Dutch were equally averse to another proposal,
 III. which was urged with much earnestness by the 1609. Spanish commissioners, that all those duties should be abolished, which were exacted in Zealand from ships entering the Scheld, in their way to Antwerp. They gave some ground however to expect that this matter might afterwards be amicably adjusted: and the archdukes were the more easily persuaded to drop their request, as they hoped to be able in the time of peace to improve their posts on the coast of Flanders, and thereby to rival the Dutch in those branches of commerce which they had engrossed during the subsistence of the war.

Contests about the Indian trade.

But of all the articles of the present treaty, the most difficult to be adjusted to the mutual satisfaction of the parties, was that which regarded the Indian trade. The archdukes were aware that unless the Dutch were gratified in this point, no accommodation whatever could take place; nor were they or their subjects personally interested in refusing to comply with their request. But being well acquainted with the obstinate and absurd reluctance of the Spaniards against making any concession on this subject, they still suspected, notwithstanding their sanguine hopes of the success of Brizuela's application, that the king would never consent to ratify the truce, if this concession were explicitly expressed. They were, for this reason, extremely solicitous to persuade the French and English ambassadors to agree to such an indirect form of expression, as might not alarm the pride or prejudice of the Spaniards, while it would admit of being interpreted in favor of the Dutch. The ambassadors were not averse to this expedient; and they afterwards prevailed upon the states to consent to it, by giving them a declaration in writing, that notwithstanding the generality and obscurity of the terms in which the article was couched, they understood it as containing a full permission to the Dutch to carry on their trade in every part of India, that was not under the dominion of the crown of Spain; and by engaging likewise in the name of the kings whom they represented, to guarantee this article relative to the Indian trade, as well as all the other articles of the present treaty ³¹.

Such were the principal points discussed between the archdukes commissioners, and the French and English ambassadors, in the conferences that were held at Antwerp. Soon after the confessor arrived at Brussels with Philip's ratification of the preliminary articles; and nothing now remained, but to settle some matters of smaller consequence, and to give the treaty its just form, in order to its being signed by the contending powers

In consequence of permission from the archdukes, the Dutch commissioners formerly mentioned, who had hitherto remained at the Hague, repaired to Antwerp: and that no solemnity might be wanting to a deed of so great importance, an extraordinary assembly of deputies from all the

As the confederates had not for many years been engaged in any matter in which they were so deeply interested, there were more than eight hundred deputies present in this assembly.

The commissioners, together with the French and English ambassadors, had meetings every day in the Hotel de Ville of Antwerp; and there was still considerable diversity of sentiments among them with regard to certain articles of the treaty, and particularly with respect to the time during which the truce should subsist. It was at length agreed, that it should be concluded for twelve years from the present period; and as soon as this and the other points in dispute were settled, and the treaty drawn up in the usual form, it was transmitted to Brussels and Bergen-op-Zoom, to receive the sanction of the archdukes and of the states; and was finally concluded on the 9th of April 1609.

Treaty for concluded.

It consisted of eight-and-thirty articles, the most important of which were those which have been already mentioned. The rest had been prepared by Barnevelt, and were equally calculated to promote the security and interest of individuals and of the state¹². No individuals had merited

¹² Among other articles it was stipulated that, during the continuance of the truce, all hostilities should cease by seas, rivers, and land, between the subjects, inhabitants, and so highly from the republic as those of the family of Nassau ; and all parties readily concurred in persons resident in the territories of the king of Spain and the archdukes , on the one hand , and the United States , on the other , without any exception of places or persons whatever.

That either party should retain safe and entire possession of whatever provinces , cities , places , lands and principalities it then enjoyed ; and that the same conditions should be observed with regard to districts , villages , and lands and territories thereon depending.

That the subjects , and persons residing in the dominions of Spain and the archdukes , of the one part , and of the United States , of the other , should mutually cultivate goodwill and friendship.

That all reproach , resentment , and revenge on account of past hostilities and injuries should cease ; and that there should be a free and equal trade between the subjects of the contracting parties by rivers , seas , and land.

That it should not be lawful to stop or lay hands on merchants , proprietors of ships , shipmasters , or their crews , or the ships , or merchandize , or goods of any kind , on any pretence : but that justice should have its usual course for the recovery of debts , and in criminal prosecutions.

If any judgments or sentences had been passed against the adherents of either party , on the footing of contumacy , and that such persons had been condemned without being defended , either in civil or criminal causes , such judgments or sentences were not to be carried into execution during the truce , either against the persons or goods of individuals so condemned.

Such persons , or their heirs and executors , as had suffered the loss of their property through the rage of party , or the violence of war ; by the rapine and injustice of individuals , and without the authority of the magistrates , and the countenance and protection of the laws ; such persons were to be reinstated , in virtue of the present treaty , in the full possession and enjoyment of their effects and estates , even although they should have actually passed into the condition, and assumed the appearance and nature of goods confiscated: whether they might have been deposited as pledges, given away as donations, or alienated and transferred by any species of bargain, transaction, or renunciation.

If the goods or estates shall have passed out of the exchequer, and been disposed of to Private possessors, then it was stipulated, that interest should be paid to the right owners of the goods, or estates, at the rate of $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum. And if this payment should be delayed, it was agreed, that the proprietors should be paid out of the stock or capital. But if the disposal or transference of such goods and estates, by the exchequer, had been accompanied with such solemnities as constitute legal deeds, and the names of the right owners been erased and superseded, by such legal formalities as constitute legal rights and claims, yet even in that case, it was provided, that their estates, rights, and properties should be restored to the right owners, they refunding to any persons that might be at that time in possession, the bona fide price (where any had been given) which such persons might have paid on purchasing any of the said lands or properties since the confiscation, within the space of a year from the date of the present treaty.

That no length of time, not even the whole space from the very beginning of the commotions in 1567, should be considered as having conferred a prescriptive right to property.

Persons who, during the course of the present war, had retired into the dominions of neutral powers, were to be comprehended, and have the full benefit and advantage of the treaty: they were to return, if they were so inclined, to the places of their former abodes, or to settle in whatever place they should chuse, provided always, that they should comply with established manners, laws, and customs.

It was declared, in general terms, that all confiscations, and disinherisons, and transferences of property that had oriprovided that none of the descendants of William, the first prince of Orange, should be liable for the debts which that prince had contracted from the year 1567 till his death. And by another, that such of his estates, within the territory of the archdukes, as had been confiscated, should be restored, and his heirs permitted to enjoy them unmolested during the continuance of the truce¹¹.

The archdukes engaged that these and all the other articles should, within the space of three months, be ratified by the king of Spain; and the king's deed of ratification was accordingly delivered to the states a few days before the expiration of that term, to transfer to his brother and his children the several high employments which he held at whatever period he should think fit. These resolutions of the states seem to have originated from the French monarch, and were generated in the violence of civil war, and the bitterness of party-zeal, should be broken, cancelled, and to all intents and purposes, null and void.

¹¹ Besides these proofs of attachment to the family of the prince of Orange, the states had, some time before the conclusion of the truce, resolved that prince Maurice's appointments, as admiral and captain-general, should not suffer any diminution from the reduction of the forces. They even gave him an additional revenue, as a compensation for his share of the prizes and contributions; and they likewise augmented the appointments of prince Henry Frederic, and count William Lewis of Nassau. Such was the conclusion of that negotiation, which, for more than two years, had employed the attention, not only of the contracting parties, but likewise of most of the other princes and states in Europe.

formed at the instance of Barnevelt, whom Jeannin had engaged to enter into his master's views. No person questioned that prince Maurice's family were well entitled to every mark of favor which the states could bestow; it was rather unfortunate however for the prince's character that, after so violent an opposition to the truce, his acquiescence in it was so quickly followed by pecuniary rewards. But although his enemies were disposed to insinuate that these rewards were rather to be considered as the price of his silence, than as rewards for his former services, there is nothing to justify these insinuations in the numerous letters extant in Jeannin's negotiations, either of the king or the ministers of France.

The Dutch were henceforward considered as a free and independent people. Having gained immortal honor by the magnanimity which they had displayed during the continuance of the war, they were now considered as having obtained the reward which their virtue merited, and were every where respected and admired. Their ministers at foreign courts were now received with the same distinction as those of other sovereign powers; and their alliance was courted by nations who had formerly regarded them as rebels, that must speedily submit to the yoke which they had shaken off.

On the other hand, the reputation of the Spanish nation received a mortal wound; and their power ceased to be regarded with the same dread as formerly. They had been foiled by a handful of their own subjects, and would not, it was supposed, any longer pretend to give law to other nations. The high spirited nobility, and the people in general, were secretly mortified by the concessions which the Dutch had been able to extort; and were ready to ascribe the humiliation which the nation had suffered, not so much to any insurmountable difficulty in the contest in which it had been so long engaged, as to misconduct and want of vigor on the part of government.

THE Spanish nation was now at peace with all the world, except the piratic states of Barbary; and it might justly have been expected that the king and his ministers would have instantly applied themselves to the healing of those wounds which the monarchy had received during the continuance of the war. But their incapacity for government, joined to their bigoted zeal for the Catholic superstition, prevented them from availing themselves of the tranquillity which they enjoyed, and determined them to engage in a new enterprise, which, although their endeavours were attended with greater success, than had accompanied their attempt to subdue the United Provinces, proved no less pernicious to the national prosperity. The Spanish arms had been unsuccessfully employed against foreign nations, for more than half a century; and all ranks of men had felt the necessity of putting a period to the war; yet no sooner was peace established, than it was resolved to expel from the bosom of the kingdom several hundred thousands of its most industrious inhabitants.

The Moreos had lived in Spain for more than eight hundred years; and still, after so long a period, remained a separate people, distinguished from the Spaniards by their language, their religion, their character, and their manners.

Account of the Moreos.

The present race were the descendants of those fanatic warriors, who, issuing forth from the deserts of Arabia, actuated with the wild ambition of compelling mankind to embrace the Mahometan superstition, had, with the most astonishing rapidity, reduced under subjection to their caliphs Persia, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, and had afterwards extended their conquests as far as the Straits of Gibraltar along the coast of Africa. From Africa they transported an army into Spain, where in less than two years they expelled the Christian inhabitants from all the open and more fertile parts of the kingdom, and obliged them to take shelter in the mountainous regions of Asturia, and the other northern provinces.

Spain had, about three centuries before, been conquered by the Goths, who had not only embraced the religion, but had likewise, as far as could be expected from ignorant Barbarians, adopted the language of the former inhabitants, and the distinction between the conquerors and the conquered had long been lost. Their language was that corrupt dialect of the Roman tongue, with a mixture of the Gothic, which is still the language of Castile; and their religion was the Christian mingled with the superstitions of the church of Rome. They held the religion of their invaders in great abhorrence, and being at the same time zealously attached to their own, great numbers of them chose, rather than be guilty of apostacy, to abandon the fertile provinces which they had so long inhabited, and to fly, with their wives and children, to those uncultivated parts of the kingdom, where, amidst caves and rocks, they might maintain their religion and their liberty.

The Moors, in the mean time, established their dominion in Portugal, in the greater part of Castile, Murcia, Andalusia, Valencia, and Granada. Their kings made choice of Cordova for their place of residence; and, as numerous supplies of people every year arrived from Africa, they soon attained such a degree of strength as convinced the Christians, that no attempt to recover their possessions could prove effectual.

A predatory war however was begun, within half a century after the conquest, and the Christians, excited and conducted by Pelagio, and other descendants of their ancient kings, gave many signal proofs of heroic bravery; but their success did not fully correspond to their exertions, till a considerable time afterwards, when various causes concurred to render the contest less unequal.

Their character.

The Moors, naturally prone to ease and pleasure, had lost much of that warlike spirit, which they had derived from the sanguinary genius of their religion. Their kings were weak men, dissolved in luxury, had been from the beginning extremely ill obeyed by their viceroys, and at length these viceroys, on whom their kings, agreeably to the oriental manners of government, devolved too great a share of their authority, shook off their allegiance, assumed the titles of kings themselves, and erected their governments into separate independent states. They were often engaged in war against each other, or the king of Cordova, from whom they had revolted. Their strength was thereby much impaired; and they could seldom act in concert against their common enemy.

It was long before the Christians could rightly improve the opportunities which were thus afforded them. For they too were divided into several unconnected sovereignties; and, for many years, through misunderstandings, joined to the distance at which they lay from one another, they found it no less difficult to act in concert than the Moors. But, at length, several of these little sovereignties being united under one head¹, the war was carried on with greater vigor than ever on the part of the Christians. The Mahometans were, in numberless rencounters, overpowered. They were expelled from many parts of the open country, of which they had long held possession, and had much reason to apprehend that, if they did not correct the errors in their government, or

IV. they must ere long sink under the growing power 1609. and superior bravery of the enemy.

Their downfall was long retarded by the folly of the Christians, who, on numberless occasions, suffered equally with the Moors, from the want of concord. Far from taking warning from the misfortunes of the Moors, they were almost continually at war with each other, and often seemed to be no less intent on one another's destruction, than on that of their common enemy. It often happened that, by the conquests which they obtained over each other, states of a considerable magnitude were formed, the sovereigns of which, if they had acted wisely, must have proved an overmatch for the Moors. But these states were no sooner formed than they were again dissolved, through the pernicious practice adopted by the kings, of dividing their dominions among their children. This practice, of which there are many instances in the history of Spain, was, at different periods, a copious source of animosity and discord. It proved equally pernicious to the people, and to the families of the kings, and long rendered it impossible for them to make any considerable effort against the infidels.

Their exertions, however, were generally much more vigorous and successful than those of their opponents; and before the end of the thirteenth century, they had acquired the kingdoms of Castile, Navarre, Arragon, Murcia, and Valencia. Their intestine divisions still arose, at times, to the same height as formerly; and the Christian, as well as the Mahometan parts of Spain, exhibited, almost every year, some new scenes of bloodshed and devastation; till towards the end of the fifteenth century, when, by the marriage of Ferdinand with Isabella, the crown of Castile was united to that of Arragon: an event which, while it in a great measure secured internal tranquillity to the Christians, gave them a decided superiority over their ancient enemies.

At this period, the only Moorish kingdom which remained unconquered was that of Granada, which contained a great extent of fertile country, and several of the strongest towns in Spain. From the situation of some of the chief of these towns on the sea-coast, the Moors could easily receive assistance from their friends in Africa; and Ferdinand was, on this account, the more solicitous to deprive them of so important a possession.

This artful prince was seldom at a loss to find pretexts to color his ambitious enterprises; and the present juncture was the most favorable to his design which could justly be expected. There were two competitors, at this time, for the crown of Granada, Alboharcidill, and his nephew Boabdilla; and the whole kingdom was torn in pieces by the contending parties, who often satiated their vengeance in each other's blood.

Ferdinand could not suffer so favorable an opportunity to escape: he first entered into an alliance with the nephew against the uncle, under the cover of which he made war upon the latter,

BOOK and expelled him from his territories ; and soon
 IV. afterwards , he turned his arms against his ally , 1609. made himself master of the city of Granada ² ,
 and all his other fortified places ; and , although he still affected to treat him with respect , he soon rendered it necessary for him to abandon his dominions , and retire to Africa.

In the prosecution of the war , Ferdinand gave proof of great abilities , as well as of the most consummate artifice. Notwithstanding which it was protracted to the unusual length of ten years ;
 and , from the difficulty which he encountered in his operations against a people so much weakened by intestine divisions , it is probable that he would not have been able to complete their subjection , if their whole force united had been employed in repelling his attacks. Their kings had , in a great measure , lost their affection by their folly and misconduct ; and , for this reason , they were not so reluctant , as they would otherwise have been ,
 against transferring their allegiance : but they required , and Ferdinand judged it expedient , to grant them such conditions as they thought would put them nearly on the same footing with his other subjects.

Of these conditions it was one that they should be permitted the free exercise of their religion ;
 and for the first seven years after the conquest ,
 no violence was offered them on that account.
 Ferdinand expected , that after the abolition of their government , they might easily be converted to the Christian faith. But, finding that the instructions of the ecclesiastics on this head were not attended with the desired effect, he resolved, notwithstanding his engagement confirmed by an oath, rather to employ compulsion, than any longer to indulge so great a proportion of his subjects in the exercise of a false religion.

IV.
1609.

He made choice of the celebrated Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, to carry his design into execution; and, for this purpose, ordered him to repair to Granada, with full power to employ whatever measures he should judge to be most expedient. Ximenes began with caressing, and making presents to some of the leading men among the Moriscoes, and thus persuaded some of them to submit to be baptized. But, making little progress in this way, and his natural impatience and severity quickly prompting him to have recourse to other methods, more agreeable to his disposition, he threw all such of their leaders as refused to comply with his request, into prisons and dungeons, where they were treated as if they had been guilty of the most atrocious crimes.

The Moriscoes persecuted by the Spaniards.

The people, highly incensed against him, on account of this violent procedure, took up arms, and having surrounded his palace, demanded that their leaders might be released. But having no person among them invested with authority to conduct their operations, they were quickly dispersed by the count de Tendilla, the governor of the citadel: immediately after which Ferdinand, by the advice of Ximenes, sent judges to Granada,

BOOK and by these judges the people were found guilty
IV. of rebellion against his government. It was declar-1609. ed by these judges that the whole Moreos in Granada, though only a small part of them had been concerned in the insurrection, were yet, on that account, liable to be capitally punished; and the king was well prepared with his army to carry the sentence into execution. But having offered them a pardon, on condition of their embracing the Christian religion; upwards of fifty thousand of them, all citizens of the town of Granada, submitted to be baptized.

The inhabitants of the country were treated with equal violence; for they too, upon receiving intelligence of what had passed in Granada, had begun to put themselves into a posture of defence. The count de Tendilla was ordered to march against them with an army of veteran troops; and this general, in order to intimidate them, put all the inhabitants of one of their towns, men, women, and children, to the sword. Still,
 however, they refused to lay down their arms,
 till Ferdinand himself, at the head of a numerous army, having reduced all their fortified places, the greater part of them consented to purchase their lives at the expense of their religion; and the rest, upon paying ten dollars each of them, as a ransom, were permitted to transport themselves to Barbary.

From this time, the Granada Moreos were considered by the Spaniards as Christians, although it can hardly be supposed that any of them were sincerely converted to the Christian faith. They were styled the New Christians, in contradistinction from the Spaniards, who were called the Old. They were not admitted to the enjoyment of any office, either in the church or state. But when they discovered, on any occasion, an attachment to Mahometanism, they were treated by the inquisition as apostates; and great numbers of them were, every year, condemned by that tribunal, and committed to the flames.

B O O K
IV.
1609.

By this treatment, which was equally impolitical and unchristian, their prejudices against the catholic religion, and the Spanish government, were strengthened and confirmed. Their ill-humor, however, showed itself only in murmurs and complaints: and the Moreos in Granada are scarcely mentioned in the Spanish history, till the reign of Philip II. when, in consequence of fresh oppression, having made an unsuccessful attempt to vindicate their liberty, most of them, as formerly related, were transplanted into Castile, and other inland provinces.

It is not to be doubted that Philip would have treated the Moreos of Valencia, in the same manner as those of Granada, had he not been deterred by his experience of the expense and danger with which the reduction of the latter had been accompanied. The Moorish kingdom of Valencia had been conquered by James I. king of Aragon, before the middle of the thirteenth century; and this prince had been extremely solicitous to have the people converted to the Christian faith.

BOOK He had, for this purpose, erected schools, where
IV. the ecclesiastics might learn the Arabic; and, in 1609. obedience to his commands, several Dominicans and other friars, had applied themselves to the study of that language, after acquiring which, they had entered on the office of missionaries among the Morefcoes. But whether they were not sufficiently acquainted with that language, to be able to teach in it, or had not sufficient patience for so arduous a task as that of combating the religious prejudices of a people noted for their bigotry, they soon began to represent the Morefcoes as obstinate infidels, whom it was in vain to expect to convert by instruction. Even miracles, they pretended, had been wrought among them without success, and, therefore, compulsion was now the only expedient that could prove effectual.

At the instigation of these ecclesiastics, Pope Clement, the fourth of that name, having advised the king to expel the Morefcoes from his dominions if they should still refuse to be converted, James would readily have embraced this council, if he could have persuaded his cortes to consent. But, by the free constitution of the government of Arragon, to which Valencia was now annexed, the consent of the cortes was requisite; and, although the clergy and commons were willing to gratify the king, yet the barons, who foresaw the ruin of their estates if the Morefcoes, their vassals, were expelled, opposed the measure with such inflexible obstinacy, that James found it necessary to relinquish his design.

From this period, to the conquest of Granada by Ferdinand, almost two hundred years had elapsed; and during all that time, the Valencia Moors had been indulged in the free exercise of their religion. But when the barons heard of the violence with which Ferdinand had treated the Moors of Granada, they dreaded an extension of his tyranny to their vassals in Valencia; and, in order to prevent it, they required, and, though with some difficulty, obtained his assent to a law passed in the cortes, in the year 1510, where it was enacted that no Morefco, within the kingdom of Valencia, should either be expelled from the kingdom, or compelled to embrace the Christian faith.

Nor were the barons satisfied with taking this precaution; but, in order to prevent the court or the ecclesiastics from reviving their design, in any future reign, they resolved to make it henceforth a part of their king's coronation-oath, that, on no pretence whatever, he should attempt to expel the Morefcoes from Valencia, or employ force to engage them to embrace the Christian religion; that he should never attempt, directly or indirectly, to procure a dispensation from this oath, nor even accept of a dispensation, in case it should be offered him.

This oath was sworn, a few years after, by Charles V. at his accession; and the barons seemed then to possess the utmost security which they could desire against any future oppression of their vassals. But they soon experienced, how ineffectual

BOOK the wisest precautions sometimes prove against IV. the events of fortune. A bloody war having 1609. broken out between the commons, and nobles of Valencia, in the year 1520; the former, actuated partly perhaps by religious bigotry, but principally by revenge against the latter, published a manifesto, requiring all the Morescoes, under the penalty of death, immediately to embrace the catholic religion.
 The nobles were, at that time, unable to afford them protection against their enemies; and as the Morescoes were themselves sufficiently acquainted with the violent character of the commons, they knew that it would be in vain to offer any remonstrance on the subject.
 Without delay, therefore, almost the whole of them consented to be baptized, in the hopes that, when tranquillity should be restored, no advantage would be taken by the court of this deed of theirs, which was known to be the effect of lawless force and violence.

But no sooner were the civil commotions of the kingdom composed, than Charles, having convened an assembly of the clergy, to consider of the validity of that baptism, to which the Morescoes had been obliged to submit; it was determined by this assembly, that although they ought not to have been compelled to submit to be baptized, yet the character thereby impressed upon them was indelible, they were henceforth to be considered as Christians, and in the case of a defection from the catholic religion, to be treated as apostates; that the name of God, as is subjoined

in the decree, may not be blasphemed, nor contempt brought upon the Christian profession.

The Moreoscos, conscious of a sincere attachment to the Mahometan faith, and being at no loss to understand, that by this decree it was intended they should henceforth be subject to the jurisdiction of the inquisition, they had no other expedient left to save themselves from the cruelty of that barbarous tribunal, but to assert (which great numbers of them did) that they had not been baptized; and as, amidst the confusion of civil discord, no register of their baptisms had been kept, it was impossible in most cases to disprove their assertion.

Of this difficulty the ecclesiastics gave information to the emperor; and about the same time, a dispensation from his coronation oath was sent him by the pope¹. Charles had acquired a great accession of power by his suppression of the late rebellion; and the power of the nobles had suffered a proportional diminution. Being no longer afraid, therefore, of any opposition which he might receive from the Valencia barons, and being delivered from his religious scruples by the pope's dispensation from his oath, he first² gave orders to the clergy to apply themselves to the instruction of the Moreoscos in the Christian faith, commanding the barons to require a punctual attendance from their vassals, on the instructions that should be given them; and in the following

BOOK year, he ordered all the Morefcoes, who denied
IV. their having been formerly baptized, either im-1609. mediately to fubmit to that initiatory rite, or to quit the Spanifh dominions, under the penalty of perpetual fervitude.

The Morefcoes of Pianaguazil refufed to accept of this alternative, and had recourfe to arms in their defence; but thefe men having been eafily reduced to obedience, it was believed that, after the year 1526, there was hardly a fingle Morefco in Spain who had not fubmitted to the rite of baptifm.

There was no reafon however to fuppofe that any confiderable number of them were fincerely converted to the Chriftian faith; and, as it is impoffible for men who act a fictitious part, uniformly to conceal their real fentiments, the hiftory of Spain, during the reign of Charles and that of his fucceffor, is filled with complaints againft them^s, on account of their infidelity. Frequent councils were held at Madrid, to confider of the proper means of effectuating their converfion.
 Orders were repeatedly fent from thence, requiring the clergy to exert themfelves with greater activity in inftructing them; and the inquisition every year exercifed againft great numbers of them its wonted rigor and feverity.

Still, however. it fhould feem that their attachment to the Mahometan fuperftition, as well as to their ancient manners and cuftoms, remained as ftrong as ever.

^s The reader will remember that the Morefcoes here
 fpoken of, are thofe of Valencia.

Nor will this appear surprising, if it is true that men are commonly attached to a false religion in proportion to its absurdity; because, not being accustomed to employ their reason on the subject of religion, they are incapable of being convinced by reason. But, besides this consideration, there were other causes which concurred in producing that unconquerable obstinacy which the Moreos discovered in their adherence to Mahometanism. They were proud of professing a religion, which was the religion of all those mighty empires that had been founded by their ancestors.

They had often entertained the hopes of being rescued by means of the Turks, and other Mahometans, from the Spanish yoke, and could not resolve entirely to abandon a religion which they expected, sooner or later, to be at liberty to profess. Their hereditary hatred of the Spaniards, which had been nourished by an uninterrupted course of hostilities during several centuries, had been riveted, since the conquest, by the severity with which they had been used; while their aversion, to the catholic worship was heightened by the appearance which the use of images in that worship gave it of idolatry, against every species of which all Mahometans are actuated with the most irreconcilable aversion. When to these considerations we add how little qualified the Spanish ecclesiastics were to instruct them in the principles of Christianity, and that most of the Moreos lived detached from the Spaniards in towns and villages, and districts by themselves, seldom associating

The attachment of the Moreos to the Mahometan religion accounted for.

B O O K with any but those of their own persuasion, and
IV. speaking a language of which the ecclesiastics, as 1609. well as the people, were extremely ignorant; when all these circumstances are considered, it will not be so surprising, as at first sight it might appear, that so small a number of them should have been converted to the Christian faith.

It must, at the same time, be acknowledged that their infidelity afforded just ground for uneasiness to the Spanish monarchs, who could hardly expect to gain the affections of a people, differing so widely from themselves, and from their Spanish subjects, in matters regarded as the most important and essential. The most inveterate enemies of Spain had for many years been the Turks, and the Moors of Barbary; and it could scarcely be supposed, that, in the case of an invasion by these powers, the Morecoes would be averse to exchange their present masters for others, whose religion, customs, and manners, were so nearly similar to their own.

Good policy, therefore, required that no pains should be spared, on the part of the kings of Spain, to accomplish the conversion of their Moreco subjects. Nor does it appear that these princes were at any time neglectful of an object which they justly deemed so highly deserving of their attention. They had instituted schools, as already mentioned, for teaching the Arabic tongue. They had often inculcated upon the clergy, to whom the instruction of the Morecoes was intrusted, the necessity of greater diligence in their endeavours to reclaim them. The royal commands on this head had, on different occasions, been enforced by the Roman pontiffs; and, in order to engage men, properly qualified, to apply themselves to this important work, they had augmented the church-livings in many of those parts of the kingdom where the Moors resided.

These were perhaps the only means which the religious prejudices of the people, and the maxims or genius of the Spanish government, would permit to be employed; and if the Moreiscoes had, at the same time, been used with greater kindness, or even with greater lenity and forbearance, it is probable that, sooner or later, these means would have been attended with the desired success. But, besides that, the faith which the Spanish princes had pledged to them when they submitted to their authority had been often violated, they had been from the beginning treated with every mark of jealousy and suspicion; they had been excluded from all the honors, and from every important office in the state; encouragement had been given to the most minute and malignant investigation of their private conduct; and after the power of the barons, who had long acted as their protectors, was reduced, they were exposed a defenceless prey to the avarice and cruelty of the Inquisition.

The kings of Spain were too deeply tinged with the bigotry of the Romish church, and their maxims of government too despotic, to allow them to perceive the absurdity of these measures, so extremely ill calculated to promote the purpose for which they were designed. Charles the Fifth, however, and Philip the Second, two princes noted for their political discernment, being aware of the prejudice which the kingdom would sustain, if the Morecoes, who formed so great a proportion of their subjects were expelled, had given no ground to suspect that they would ever consent to their expulsion; nor does it appear that the clergy, who earnestly wished that this measure might be embraced, ever attempted to recommend it either to Charles or his son. But, soon after the accession of the present king, they conceived the hopes of being able to accomplish their desire; because both Philip and his minister, they thought, would be influenced more by religious than political considerations; and, in case they could be persuaded that the interest of religion was concerned in the expulsion, would be easily reconciled to the political inconveniences that might attend it.

The motives which determined the ecclesiastics in their conduct on this occasion were not merely such as were suggested by religious zeal or bigotry. The obstinacy of the Morecoes in adhering to Mahometanism had been generally ascribed to the remissness or negligence of those who had been employed to instruct them⁷; and the clergy were sensible that much greater pains were requisite for this end than they were willing to bestow.

⁷ By a brief from the pope, Gregory XIII. an. 1576.

Besides which, their revenues had been taxed for augmenting the Morescoe vicarages, and for building and endowing an additional number of churches for their instruction. They were, on both these accounts, inflamed against the Morescoes with a peculiar hatred; and, in order that they might at once avoid the labor necessary for converting them, and the censure which they must incur in case of their declining it, they earnestly desired their expulsion; and, in order to effectuate it, were perpetually inveighing against them as an incurable race of infidels, of whose conversion, without a miraculous interposition of Divine Power, no hopes could justly be entertained.

Of all the ecclesiastics, the person who discovered the most unrelenting hatred against this unhappy people was Don John de Ribera, patriarch of Antioch, and archbishop of Valencia, an aged prelate, who was held in high veneration by his countrymen for his piety and learning; and, in different histories of his life, published in Spain and Italy, is celebrated as one of the brightest ornaments that ever adorned the Christian church.

But there is nothing for which the historians have been so liberal in his praise as the flaming zeal which he displayed in his unwearied exertions for the expulsion of the Morescoes, in which they suppose him to have been equally animated by a patriotic concern for the safety of Spain, and a pious solicitude for the preservation of the Catholic faith.

It has been questioned, however, whether his motives were in reality so pure as his admirers would have us to believe; for there is ground to suspect, that, after the Pope, at the request of Philip II. imposed a new tax of between three and four thousand dollars yearly on the revenues of his archbishopric, for augmenting the salaries of the curates employed in instructing the Moreoscos, his zeal for their expulsion became more violent than ever. This tax, it is said, neither he, nor any of the clergy in his diocese, ever paid; and although the king, in order more easily to reconcile the Moreoscos to Christianity, had obtained from the Pope an edict of grace in their favor, containing a plenary pardon for all their past offences, on condition that, within the space of four years, they should make confession to certain commissioners, to be appointed by Ribera and the other bishops, yet this edict was not published, nor any commissioners appointed, till after two years and a half, when Philip III. interposed his authority for that effect.

In defence of the archbishop's conduct in these instances, it may be alledged, that, from long experience, and many fruitless trials, he believed the infidelity of the Moreoscos to be incurable, and that he would not have thus ventured repeatedly to disobey the orders of his spiritual superior, had he not known that the sovereign pontiff, having the same opinion as himself of the vanity of all farther attempts for their conversion, did not seriously desire to have his orders carried into execution. But whatever were the motives of this prelate's conduct, and though it justly exposed him to the imputation of wishing rather to have the Morefcoes expelled than converted, no person had greater influence on this occasion with the king and his ministers in recommending the measure that was afterwards embraced.

From the arguments which he employed in two memorials on the subject, presented to the king, the reader will be better able to judge of the motives by which both he and the court of Spain were determined. In his first memorial, dated in the year 1602, his principal design was to sound their inclination, and to awaken in them a sense of the danger to which the kingdom was exposed.

"After all the pains, he said, which had been bestowed in attempting to convert the Morefcoes to Christianity, they were still as strongly as ever attached to the Mahometan superstition. In the kingdom of Valencia, the bishops, the rectors, and preachers, had in vain used their most strenuous endeavours to persuade them to avail themselves of the Pope's edict of grace, which had been lately published. In reasoning with their leading men, it had been observed, that, as often as they were put to silence by the arguments employed to convince them, they changed color, and were so inflamed with indignation, as evidently showed how much they desired to be able to employ force in defence of their opinions. They corresponded with those of their own sect in the

 with one mouth, and had the same answer to return to their instructors, that they were already Christians; that they had already confessed all the sins, of which they were conscious, to their respective priests; and that, being occupied with their proper business, they had not leisure to attend to the conduct of others, and therefore knew not of any persons who practised the rites of the Mahometan religion. They had often been convicted of falsehood; but on these occasions they were either silent, or they repeated the same reply to the questions that were put to them. Since the publication of the edict of grace, they had celebrated the festivals of their religion with greater solemnity than before; and, with much effrontery, had caroused together, on receiving intelligence of the unsuccessful issue of the expedition of his majesty's forces against Algiers.

"From this conduct of the Morecoes, continued Ribera, which I have represented with my wonted impartial regard to truth, two important consequences follow, which require your majesty's most serious attention.

"The first is, that the bishops, and other pastors of the church, are laid under the painful necessity of doing what many learned doctors of the church
 think unlawful, the administering of the sacrament of baptism to those who they know will,
 sooner or later, become apostates from the faith;

for there is a moral certainty that every Moresco child, whom we baptize, will, through the example and instruction of his Mahometan parents, become himself a Mahomeran. And this we are taught to expect, not only by reason and experience, but by the spirit of God, who, in speaking of the infidelity of Rehoboam, makes twice mention, in one chapter, that he was the son of Naama, a Gentile; which is equivalent to declaring that to be the child of a mother who is an infidel, and to be educated by her, is a certain means of making the child an infidel.

“In baptizing the Moresco children, therefore, our consciences are greatly disturbed with the apprehension that we are guilty of violating the commandment of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has prohibited the giving of holy things to dogs, and the casting of pearls before swine.

“Nor is this the only unhappy consequence arising from the incurable infidelity of the Morescoes. But the kingdom of Spain is, therefore, exposed to the greatest risk of becoming an easy prey to the hostile designs of our enemies. This kingdom was ruined in former times by the intrigues of a single person, count Julian, at whose instigation it was invaded and subdued by the Saracens, when they had no friends within the kingdom to second their attempt. And from thence may be perceived how great occasion there is for the most disquieting apprehensions at this time, when there are established in the kingdom ninety thousand men fit to carry arms, and all of them actuated with the most irreconcilable aversion to the present government. The Turks and Moors are the inveterate enemies of Spain, because she is the principal bulwark of Christendom; the French, from jealousy, or envy of her greatness; and the English, on account of her zeal for maintaining the purity of the Catholic faith; is there not just ground to dread that these our foreign enemies, allured by the hopes of assistance from those whom we nourish in our bosom, shall unite their forces, and undertake the subversion of the monarchy? Especially when it is considered that, with the powerful assistance they would receive from the Morefcoes, a small number of troops would be sufficient, and no extraordinary preparations or expense required.

“The Morefcoes, in Granada alone, had withstood the whole force which the late king could muster against them, although, besides his Spanish troops, he had sent for into Spain a numerous reinforcement of Germans and Italians. But, if all the Morefcoes in the different parts of the kingdom were to take arms, which it is unquestionable they would do, if either the Turks, or French, or English, were to attempt an invasion, our condition would then be the most deplorable and desperate, and, like our ancestors, we must resolve either to yield our necks to the yoke of conquerors, or to take shelter, as they did, among the rocks or mountains of Asturia.

“As often as I have reflected on the imminent danger to which this mighty monarchy stands exposed, I have thought it unaccountable, that, during the long reigns of two such wise and powerful monarchs, as the emperor, and the late king, no sufficient security against it was provided. Nor can I account for their negligence in this respect, but on the supposition that God, who rules the hearts of kings, thought fit to reserve this important work, so worthy of your royal breast, on purpose to adorn the annals of your pious reign; as he reserved the deliverance of his chosen people for Moses, their entrance into the promised land for Joshua, the conquest of the Philistines for David, and the inflicting of vengeance on the Amalekites for Saul.

“Either this has been his intention, or he hath so long prevented the Spanish monarchs from perceiving the necessity of delivering Spain from so great a danger, that, by means of the Morescoes, he may punish us for our sins. But, in my opinion, one of the greatest of these is the permitting of so great a number of inveterate enemies of the church and state for so many years to retain their power of doing mischief; nor is it reasonable to expect success in foreign enterprises, till the kingdom shall be purged of its domestic foes.

“In the year 1588, when the great Armada was destroyed, I was emboldened by my zeal for the interest of religion and my country, to represent to your royal father, that, after having long and carefully inquired why it had pleased God to permit so great a calamity to befall us, I was persuaded that he intended thereby to instruct the king, that, till he had extirpated heresy from his own dominions, he ought not to have suffered his attention to be diverted by any thing that passed in foreign states. And, in like manner, confiding in your majesty's clemency for forgiveness of the liberty which I take, I must declare that, after the most mature consideration, it appears to me, that no other account but this can be given of the late failure of your expedition against Algiers, in which there was nothing omitted which human prudence could suggest to insure success.

"It is the will of heaven, that your majesty should first provide for the safety and tranquillity of your own dominions; and, in order to accomplish this end, it is necessary that your domestic enemies, those apostates from the faith, who are equally enemies to the state and to our most holy religion, should be deprived of the power of disturbing your repose. No object, surely, can be more deeply interesting; and, therefore, I trust I shall be pardoned for presuming, with due humility, to exhort your majesty to require your ministers, without delay, to apply themselves to the consideration of it, with all that serious attention which it so highly deserves, excluding from all the councils which shall be held for that purpose, all those persons whose private interest may hinder them from perceiving what is conducive to the public good *."

* Vida de Ribera.

This memorial was most graciously received by the king and the duke of Lerma, both of whom wrote letters of thanks to the patriarch for the wholesome counsel which it contained, and required him to give them his opinion with regard to the proper means of obviating that imminent danger, to which it appeared, from his memorial, the kingdom was exposed. In compliance with this request, and emboldened by the confidence reposed in him, Ribera soon after presented another memorial, of which the purport was, partly to persuade Philip that no other means could prove effectual for the utter extirpation of the Moreiscos; and partly to take off the force of such objections, as either religion or humanity might suggest, to deter him from having recourse to this expedient.

In sacred writ, he said, there was no precept so often repeated to the chosen people of God as that of rooting out from among them those infidel nations whom they found in possession of the promised land. A strict obedience to this precept was particularly inculcated on the kings and rulers of the people; and the first king, whom God himself had appointed to rule over them, incurred the divine displeasure, and was deprived of his kingdom, merely on account of his disobedience. The pernicious consequences of permitting the Moreiscos to remain in Castile and Aragon were the same as those which the children of Israel experienced from their communication with the idolatrous heathens; for the faithful in Spain were in equal danger from the infection of their example, and the extirpation of these infidels was therefore equally incumbent on the catholic king, as that of the heathens on the kings and captains of the Jews.

In following the example of David, and other good kings of Israel, Philip would likewise imitate the conduct of some of the best and greatest of his predecessors; by whom the Jews had, at different periods, been expelled from Spain, though their provocations had never been so great as those of the Morefcoes; for the Jews were not heretics and apostates as they were, and were never accused of holding correspondence with the enemies of the state.

His illustrious grandfather, Charles V. the wisest and greatest prince of the age in which he lived, had published an edict, requiring the Morefcoes either to submit to be baptized, or to depart from Spain; expecting that by submitting to be baptized they would become both Christians and friends. It now appeared how much he was mistaken in this expectation; but, from the tenor of his edict, it was manifest how much he thought it his duty, and how necessary he believed it for the safety and prosperity of his people, to extirpate infidels from his dominions.

The pernicious effects of tolerating apostates from the faith, had been severely felt by the French monarchs, whose kingdom had thereby been reduced to the lowest ebb, and their Catholic subjects exposed, for almost half a century, to all the miseries of civil war; whereas, if they had acted conformably to the measures of the church, and either put to death their heretical subjects, or expelled them from the kingdom, all these unhappy consequences might have been prevented, and the purity of the faith preserved.

The temporal as well as the spiritual interest of the king's catholic and loyal subjects, required that the Morescoes should be expelled; because, if they were not, there was much ground to apprehend they would ere long become masters of all the riches in the kingdom. They were not only industrious, but frugal and parsimonious to excess. They could labor for much lower wages, and were satisfied with much smaller profits in trade than were requisite for the subsistence of the Spaniards; great numbers of whom were thus excluded from both trade and labor, and thereby reduced to indigence. The Spanish villages, all over Castile and Andalusia, had fallen into decay; while those of the Morescoes increased and flourished; and the Spanish farmers were unable to pay their rents, though they cultivated the most fertile parts of the country; while the Morescoes, who generally lived in the most barren parts, after paying the third part of their crops to the proprietors of their farms, were not only able to support themselves and their families, but annually to increase their stock.

In consequence of this their number had of late been greatly augmented; and there was ground to dread that, if some remedy were not speedily

B O O K applied, the natives would in a few years be outnumbered and overpowered. But no remedy
IV. whatever, he believed, would be found effectual,
1609. while the Morescoes were permitted to continue within the kingdom. The king's humanity, he supposed, would revolt at the thoughts of putting so many hundred thousands to the sword, and therefore the only expedient which remained, was to transport them into foreign parts.

He did not however think it advisable to expel them all at once; for, as those of Valencia lived in a great measure detached from the Christians, in villages and districts by themselves, there was little danger from the infection of their example; besides that the Moors of those parts practised various useful arts, which were unknown to the Christians, but were extremely necessary for the comfort and convenience of life. If all these Moors were to be at once expelled, those arts would be entirely lost, and a great part of the country would become waste and desolate. But although for these reasons it might be judged expedient to delay their expulsion, they ought, in the mean time, to be loaded with taxes for the maintenance of an army, sufficient to prevent any prejudice that might arise from permitting them to remain; their numbers ought, as quickly as possible, to be diminished, by sending annually some thousands of their young men to the galleys and the mines, and Christians, acquainted with their arts, ought gradually to be substituted in their room.

But a different course, he thought, ought to be pursued with regard to the Moreoscos in the other provinces, who were, on many accounts, much more formidable than those of Arragon and Valencia. They had every-where intermixed with the Christians; their example was consequently more infectious; and the churches and altars were profaned by their hypocritical and mock compliances with the holy rites of the true religion. They spoke the Castilian language; their minds were more cultivated and improved; they were better acquainted with the state of Spain, and much more capable of giving dangerous intelligence to her enemies; besides which, great numbers of them, having served in the royal army, were thereby not only qualified to act as spies, but to afford assistance to the enemy, in the case of an invasion or attack, or to any foreign enemy, by whom the kingdom should be attacked.

By these considerations he was induced to believe that the preservation of the kingdom, as well as the interest of religion, required that all the Moreoscos in Spain, those of Arragon and Valencia excepted, should be instantly expelled. They were all to be considered as obstinate heretics, or as apostates from the faith, whom the king, if he thought fit, might justly punish with death; and there could be no room therefore to doubt of the lawfulness of transporting them to foreign countries, which was the mildest punishment that, consistently with the safety of his kingdom, he could inflict.

Their children, under seven years of age, might be detained, in order to be educated in the Christian faith; and the king might, without any scruple of conscience, compel any number of those who were grown up, to serve on board his gallies, or in the mines of America; while, for the benefit of his exchequer, he might sell the rest for slaves to his Christian subjects in Spain and Italy. It could not be unjust to punish men in this manner, who by their crimes had forfeited their lives; and if it was just to punish them either with slavery or death, the simply expelling them from Spain, and transporting them to other countries, where their own religion was professed, could not be considered in any other light but as an act of clemency and mercy on the part of the king.

It might be difficult, he acknowledged, to effectuate their expulsion, without endangering the internal peace of the kingdom; but God, he trusted, would enlighten the minds of the king's ministers, and enable them to discern the most proper means of carrying so laudable a design into execution; for, as the counsel he had offered was equally dictated by his regard to the spiritual and to the temporal interest of the kingdom, he could not doubt that it was acceptable to God; and when he reflected on his great age, his natural temper and disposition, and the habits which he had long indulged of a retired and sequestered life, he could hardly suppose that the zeal and resolution with which he felt himself inspired in his address to the king, on the present occasion, could proceed from any other cause but the secret and all powerful influence of the spirit of God upon his mind? B O O K

The reasoning in this memorial was admirably fitted to make impression on the superstitious and timid temper of the king; nor was its efficacy lessened by the patriarch's vain pretension to divine illumination. But although both Philip's religious scruples, and his apprehensions of impending danger, were easily excited, his natural disposition, which was gentle and humane, rendered him extremely averse to a measure so replete with cruelty, as that which Ribera had exhorted him to adopt. He could not therefore resolve to comply with the counsel that was given him, and his irresolution was increased by a memorial which was soon afterwards presented to him by the barons of Valencia.

The effect of the reasoning of Ribera on the mind of the king.

They had received intelligence from some of their friends at court of the patriarch's two memorials. They knew that he had advised the king to permit their vassals to remain for some time longer, which they ascribed to his dread of their resentment; but they believed that the expulsion of the other Morescoes, would be quickly followed by that of those in Valencia, and for this reason they were equally alarmed as if he had counselled the whole to be expelled.

In order to deter the king from listening to his proposal, they unanimously remonstrated against the expulsion, as a measure that would be attended with the most pernicious consequences; for the Morescoes were not only a frugal, temperate, and industrious race of men, but they were the most skilful farmers, and the most ingenious manufacturers in Spain. There were several manufactures, equally necessary for internal consumption and foreign trade, with which they alone were acquainted; and without their skill and labor, it was an unquestionable fact, that a great part of the kingdom would lie waste, and innumerable families of the highest rank, who entirely depended on the rents of their lands, be reduced to indigence.

It had been affirmed that they were all Mahometans, but no sufficient evidence had been produced to prove the truth of this assertion. They had all been regularly initiated, by baptism, into the Christian church; they all professed themselves to be Christians; and although many of them, perhaps, were not able to give a satisfactory account of the doctrines of the Christian faith, yet the same thing might be said of innumerable other Christians of the lower rank, besides the Morescoes.

But if many of them were in reality ignorant or unbelieving, this could not justly be imputed to them, so much as to those to whom their instruction had been committed. Sufficient pains to instruct them, and proper methods of dealing with them, had seldom been employed. They had, at first, been dragged into the church by force and violence, and had afterwards been treated with inhumanity; as if bitter invectives, corporeal punishments, and the confiscation of their effects, were the proper means of enlightening their understandings with the knowledge of the truth. In order to engage them to listen to instruction, it was necessary that their instructors should study to conciliate their affections. This end could be obtained only by gentleness and forbearance: and if the king would be pleased to take effectual care to prevent them from being treated more like brutes than men, and still more, if, as a reward for their relinquishing the Mahometan superstition, he would grant them access to the same immunities and privileges that were enjoyed by his other subjects, there would be no ground to despair of their conversion.

They had been accused of holding a treasonable correspondence with the enemies of the state; but ought a vague and general assertion to be held as a sufficient evidence of their guilt? was not this crime of such a nature, that it must necessarily be confined to a few? ought the guilt of a few to be imputed to so great a number? ought even the few who had been guilty, to be condemned without a hearing, without a trial, and without the smallest evidence?

This imputation had been often cast upon the Moreiscoes, by speculative and sequestered men, who had no access to know the truth of their assertion, but were prompted by their zeal and prejudices to believe it. It had always been disreproof or evidence was adduced. This remonstrance, which the barons presented in a cortes or parliament held in the year 1604, was not altotention of it, Philip resolved to delay the expulsion of the Morescoes for some years longer, and,

 in the mean time, make a further trial, whether it was possible to effectuate their conversion to the faith; and for this purpose, he procured a brief
Paul V. from the pope, imposing a tax on the ecclesiastical revenues, a part of which he was authorized to employ in building and endowing a Moreasco college; and in order to induce men of abilities to accept of curacies among the Morescoes, he was empowered, from the same fund, to augment the salaries of the curates.

But no greater regard it would seem was paid to this than to the other brief above mentioned.
 The college was not endowed, and the churchlivings remained the same as before, from whence there was but too much ground for the suspicion which was entertained, that the king had neither been able to interest the pope nor the Spanish ecclesiastics in the execution of his plan.

The latter labored assiduously to convince both the pope and the king, that every thing had been already done for the conversion of the Morescoes, that was in the power of man to perform. The archbishop of Valencia presented a third memorial to the king, containing, as he pretended, a full reply to what had been asserted by the barons, but consisting principally, either of invectives against the Morefcoes, or of denunciations of divine judgments, which must ere long overtake the kingdom, if they were not speedily expelled ¹⁰.

Ribera was powerfully seconded by several other ecclesiastics, and particularly by Bleda, a Dominican friar, distinguished for his acquaintance with the learning of his time, and equally noted for his activity, his zeal, and bigotry; who composed several bitter invectives against the Morefcoes, and, dividing his time between Rome and Madrid, employed all his eloquence to persuade the pontiff and the king of the necessity of their expulsion.

But the archbishop's most powerful associate, was Don Bernardo de Roias y Sandoval, brother to the duke of Lerma, who was the cardinal-archbishop of Toledo, inquisitor-general and chancellor of Spain. This prelate approved and seconded every part of Ribera's memorials, except where he advised the king to retain such of the Morefco children as were under seven years of age, and to suffer the Morefcoes in Valencia, to remain till their place could be supplied by Christians; for it

¹⁰ Some prodigies are recorded by Ribera in his memorial, and by other writers, as clear and certain indications of the will of heaven on the present occasion. Such as that the church-bell of Villila rung of itself for several days, &c. But it does not appear, whether arguments of this kind, were despised or regarded by the king.

BOOK IV. 1609. was more advisable, this cardinal maintained, to put them all, men, women, and children to the sword, than to have the Spanish blood contaminated, as it would be, if either of these exceptions were admitted by a mixture of the polluted blood of infidels.

The duke of Lerma, who, from the beginning of his administration, had studied, with great assiduity and solicitude, to ingratiate himself with the court of Rome and the Spanish ecclesiastics, readily espoused his brother's sentiments; and, as the duke was at this time in the unrivalled and full possession of the royal favor, nothing now was wanting to fix the resolution of the king¹¹.

Expulsion
of the Mo-
rescos.

It was accordingly resolved, that all the Morecoes in Spain, those in Valencia as well as those in the other provinces, should be expelled. The cardinal-archbishop went himself to Rome, with the design, it is believed, to persuade the sovereign pontiff to grant his sanction to the expulsion by some public deed: but, if this was the intention of his journey, it did not produce the desired effect. The pontiff, probably, chose that the odium which must attend a measure so barbarous and so unprecedented, should rather fall on the court of Spain than on the holy see; and, therefore, we do not read of any other papal bull or brief published on the present occasion, but one addressed to the bishops of Valencia, commanding them to assemble together, in order to consider whether any method of converting the Morecoes could be devised. This bull was dated in the year 1606, a few months before the cardinal-primate set out for Rome, but was not published till after his return, in 1608. It was published in the month of April of that year; and, in compliance with it, the bishops soon after met together, and spent several months in deliberating on the subject. But, as if the design of their meeting had been to condemn the Morefcoes, and not to consider of the means of converting them, they at length pronounced the following sentence: "That the Morefcoes of the kingdom of Valencia were all apostates from the Christian faith, and were, besides, so obstinate and inflexible in their infidelity, that, whatever means should be employed, no hopes could justly be entertained of their conversion.

This sentence, having been transmitted to the court, contributed to confirm the king in the resolution which he had formed. It was agreed, however, that the expulsion should be deferred till a more convenient season; and that, in the mean time, the strictest secrecy should be observed. It was judged necessary to keep the design secret, lest the Morefcoes should, either of themselves, or instigated by the barons, have recourse to arms; and, as no court was ever more distinguished for maintaining the most inviolable secrecy in its councils than that of Spain, it should seem that no suspicion was entertained, either by the Morefcoes or barons, of the king's determination in a matter wherein they were so deeply interested, till every necessary preparation was made for carrying it into execution.

The court having determined to begin with the expulsion of the Valencian Morefcoes, orders were fecretly given to the naval commanders in Spain, Portugal, and Italy, to receive a certain number of troops on board their fhips, and to rendezvous, in Auguft, 1609, at Alicant, Denia, and other fea-ports in the Mediterranean, on the coaft of Valencia. About the fame time, Don Auguftin Mexia, an old experienced officer, governor of Antwerp, was fent to the city of Valencia to concert with the viceroy, the marquis of Cararena, and others, concerning the meafures neceffary to be taken within the kingdom to prevent a tumult or infurrection. The pretext employed for afsembling the fleet was an expedition againft the Moors in Barbary. But the barons, obferving that frequent conferences were held, by night and by day, at the viceroy's, with regard to the fubject of which they were kept entirely in the dark, and being informed that the archbifhop (who affifted at thefe conferences), as if he expected to be befieged, had conveyed into his palace an extraordinary quantity of provifions, befides fome troops and arms, they foon came to fufpect what was the real purpofe of the naval armament; and having, conformably to a privilege which belonged to them by the conftitution of Valencia, fummoned one of thofe afsemblies of their own number, termed the Military Arms, they fent deputies to the viceroy, requefting him to acquaint them with the defign of the prefent preparations. To this inquiry, the viceroy, without pretending ignorance of the king's intention, replied, that, whatever it was, the barons might rest assured that no resolution could be formed, either by the king, who had ever regarded them as his most faithful vassals, or by the duke of Lerma, their countryman, whose estates were intermingled with theirs, which in the issue would not be found conducive to the true interest of Valencia.

By this answer the barons were confirmed in their suspicions; and, as they could not but suppose that the viceroy would have chosen, had it been in his power, to dispel their apprehensions, they could no longer doubt that the object of all the preparations which had been made was the expulsion of their vassals. They instantly convened again, and drew up a remonstrance to be presented to the king; of which the purport was, that Valencia would be entirely ruined if the Moreos, by whom most of the work in that kingdom was carried on, were expelled.

At the desire of the viceroy, who dreaded that this step might give an alarm to the Moreos, the justiza, or chief justice in criminal matters, having attempted in vain to divert them from their purpose, was so violently agitated with grief and rage, that he dropt down dead in the assembly. This accident prevented them from coming to an immediate decision; but next morning they had another meeting, in which they appointed deputies to carry their remonstrance to the king.

It was expressed in the strongest terms, dictated by a deep conviction of the melancholy truth which it contained; but the deputies, though received by the king and his minister with much distinction and respect, were told, that the king's resolution, having been formed after the most mature deliberation, was unalterable; that the Barons had been too late in presenting their petition; and that the edict of expulsion was already published.

A strong body of Castilian troops had actually entered Valencia, about the time of the arrival of the deputies at Madrid; and the Morecoes were now acquainted with their fate.

In the edict of expulsion, which was published with the usual formalities, by the viceroy, in the beginning of September, 1609, they were all commanded, men, women, and children, under the penalty of death, to be ready within three days to repair to the sea-ports appointed for their embarkation, and there to go on board of ships prepared for carrying them into foreign parts.

It was ordained, under the same penalty, that they should all remain in the places where they were at the time of publishing the edict, till the commissaries appointed to conduct them to the sea-coast, should arrive; that if any of them should, before the arrival of the commissaries, presume to change the place of their abode, they might be carried by any person before a judge; and, in case they should make resistance, might instantly be put to death.

It was enacted, that all their effects should belong to the lords whose vassals they were, except such as they could carry along with them; and, that in case they should conceal or destroy any part of their effects, they should be punished with death. BOOK

For the preservation of the sugar-works, granaries of rice, drains or aqueducts, and, in order that the Christian inhabitants might be instructed in the works and manufactures which had hitherto been carried on by the Moreoscos, it was declared that six families, to be named by the barons, out of every hundred, might remain.

It was ordained, that all children under four years of age might remain, provided their parents or guardians should consent; that children under six or seven, one of whose parents was an old Christian, might remain, and the mothers with them, though they were Moreoscos; but if the fathers were Moreoscos, and the mothers Christians, that the fathers should be expelled, while the children might remain with their mothers; that all such of the Moreoscos might remain, who, for any considerable time, had demeaned themselves as Christians, who could produce certificates from the parish-priests of their having received the sacrament, by permission of their respective bishops, or who had not for two years attended any of the Moreosco religious meetings.

They were all permitted to depart into any country, not subject to the crown of Spain, provided they should leave the kingdom within the time specified; and an assurance was given them, that no violence or injury should be offered them by those who should be employed in transporting 1609. The several concessions contained in this edict were considered by the ecclesiastics and the court of Spain as proofs of extraordinary clemency on the part of the king; but they could not be regarded in the same light by the Morescoes. They were equally overwhelmed with astonishment, and with anguish and distress. They were surrounded with enemies on every hand. The king, they perceived, though they had been taught to believe his distinguishing character to be gentleness and mercy, was their irreconcilable and mortal enemy; and their hearts sunk within them, when they reflected on the misery which they were doomed to undergo. They were not only disquieted with so near a prospect of the loss of their most valuable possessions, joined to that of perpetual banishment from their native country; but they violently dreaded that they were all to be butchered as soon as they were put on board the ships appointed for transporting them to foreign parts ¹³. They had never had any friends to whom they could look for assistance, except their patrons the barons, whose interest was inseparably linked with theirs; but the barons, they knew, were unable to afford them protection on the present occasion, and all the good offices which they had interposed in their behalf had been without avail. They had little reason, therefore, to expect that any thing which they themselves could do to avert the impending storm would prove effectual. That nothing, however, in their power might be omitted, their leading men, having met together privately in the city of Valencia, drew up a petition, and sent a deputation of their number to present it to the viceroy; in which, after solemnly asserting their innocence of the crimes imputed to them in the edict, they offered, in case the king would be persuaded to recal it, to maintain a certain number of galleys for the protection of the coast against the corsairs, to build several new forts, and to support the garrisons not only of these, but of such as were already built; to redeem all the Christians of Valencia who should ever be taken captives by the Moors, and, besides, to furnish the king with a considerable sum of money¹⁴. But the viceroy though he was himself extremely averse to the expulsion, without taking time to deliberate on their proposals, immediately replied, that there was now no room left for any petition or remonstrance; that the king was unalterably determined to put his edict into execution, and they must instantly prepare themselves, however reluctant, to submit¹⁵.

When this answer was reported by the delegates to the assembly in Valencia, their minds were variously agitated with grief, despair, and indignation. It was proposed by some of them that they should instantly have recourse to arms; for it was better, they maintained, to die fighting like men for their property and lives, than tamely to suffer themselves to be stript of their possessions, and afterwards, perhaps, to be butchered like sheep, by an implacable and cruel enemy, to whom they had never given any just occasion of offence; besides, that it might not be impossible for them to defend themselves in the mountainous parts of the country, till some foreign power, friendly to them, and hostile to the Spaniards, should come to their relief. But this proposal was rejected as desperate and impracticable by a great majority of the assembly, who represented that, as they were not provided either with arms or military stores, had no practice in war, and had been utterly unaccustomed to military discipline, it was impossible they could hold out for many weeks against so potent an enemy. The Spanish regular forces, under the most experienced officers, were already distributed all over the country, and were every where prepared to attack them on the first appearance of opposition or resistance. No time would be allowed them to put themselves into a posture of defence. They would instantly be either cut to pieces, or reduced to slavery, and an opportunity would be thus afforded to the Spaniards of gratifying at once, still more than by their expulsion, their avarice and their cruelty. It could not be supposed that the king would have incurred the expense, which his preparations for exporting them must have cost him, had he intended to destroy them on their passage, since he could have done it more easily without incurring so great an expense, besides, that so useless and so wanton a piece of treachery would cover his name with indelible disgrace. They might with confidence therefore expect to be safely conveyed to Barbary, and this was surely preferable either to death or to slavery in Spain. But while, for these reasons, all thoughts of resistance ought to be laid aside, they ought not to accept of either of the two offers that were made to them in the edict of expulsion. Neither their children under age, nor the six families out of every hundred who were permitted to remain, ought to be left behind. The Spaniards intended, by these concessions, to serve themselves, and not the Morescoes, and the latter should, for that reason, unanimously resolve to reject them with disdain.

This resolution was warmly embraced by the whole assembly; and not by them only, but by all the other Morescoes in the kingdom of Valencia, except those, who, inhabiting certain mountainous parts of the country which they deemed impregnable, formed the desperate resolution of maintaining their possessions by force of arms. Before the meeting of Valencia, great numbers of those who lived in towns, and in the more fertile parts of the country, had earnestly solicited the barons to procure them to be named among the families who were to be permitted to remain;

but no sooner were they made acquainted with the determination of their leaders, than, with one heart, and one voice, they declared that no consideration should now induce them to stay behind their kinsmen and companions.

This declaration was a matter of deep concern to the barons, who had, in some measure, been reconciled to the expulsion by the promise which had been given for six families out of every hundred to remain, and now dreaded the utter ruin of their estates, if the Moreoscoes should persevere in their present resolution. Of all the barons the duke of Gandia was likely to prove the greatest sufferer, as his estate chiefly consisted of those manufactures with which the Moreoscoes alone were acquainted. By employing all his influence with them, and making them the most advantageous offers, he at length obtained their consent, on condition that they should be allowed the free exercise of their religion. The duke solicited the viceroy to grant them this indulgence, till the Christians should be instructed in the manufactures, which would not require more than two or three years at most; but was told by the viceroy, that, agreeably to his orders from the king, it could not be granted for a single day ¹⁶. This answer being communicated to the Moreoscoes, there was not one person of more than a hundred and fifty thousand who could be persuaded to remain.

Nor were they less inflexible in refusing to leave their children behind them that were under six years of age. They were well aware, as they said to the ecclesiastics who applied to them on this head, of the great inconveniencies and dangers to which so many thousand children, with their mothers and nurses, none of whom had ever been at sea, must be exposed from being crowded together on board the ships and galleys; but they were unalterably determined to carry them along with them to whatever part of the world they themselves should go, and chose rather to see them perish before their eyes than to leave them in the hands of a people by whom their parents had been treated with so much cruelty¹⁶.

The army having been distributed into the several stations, where they might most effectually prevent any disturbance or insurrection, and the ships of war and transports, fully equipped for their intended voyage, the viceroy, without any farther delay, began to carry the royal edict into execution, by sending commissioners, with a

At Oran they were well received by the count of Aguilar, the governor of the fort, and, on his application to the viceroy of Tremezen, which stands at the distance of two days journey from Oran, leave was granted them to come to take up their residence in the former of these places. In their journey thither they were deeply affected, and few of them could restrain their tears, when they compared the desert barren plains, through which they passed, with the fertile and delightful regions of Valencia. It afforded them, however, no small consolation in their distress to reflect that, as the dread which they had entertained of being murdered by the way had proved groundless, they had now found a prince of their own religion, disposed to grant them his protection. Upon their arrival at Tremezen, they were suffered to retain all their wealth which they had brought along with them, and admitted to all the same liberties and privileges as the natives of the place.

An account of the treatment which they received having been carried to Spain, by ten persons who were suffered to return for that purpose, it contributed, in some measure, to reconcile the other Morefcoes in Valencia to their fate; and, as the winter-season was fast approaching, when they must encounter greater difficulties in their passage, they even discovered a degree of impatience to be permitted to embark ¹⁷.

No time was unnecessarily lost on the part of the viceroy. The Morefcoes, conducted by his commissaries and the royal troops, and many of them accompanied, from compassion and humanity, by the barons whose vassals they had been, were every where in motion, and hastening in crowds, with their wives and children, to the coast. The ships which had been provided for transporting them, having been found extremely inadequate to the purpose, many more were collected from the sea-ports in Spain, Majorca, and Italy. Of these many were hired by the Morefcoes themselves, who desired, as soon as possible, to emancipate themselves from the power of the Spaniards; while the greater number went on board the ships provided by the king. And in a few weeks about a hundred and twenty thousand men, women, and children had embarked.

Many of these were persons of substance and condition; some of them, on account of their early profession of Christianity, had been raised to the rank of nobility, by the emperor Charles V. And the elegance and beauty of the young Morefco women is highly celebrated by a cotemporary Spanish historian, whose bigotry often prompts him to exult in their distress.

Humanity of
the barons of Valencia.

Widely different from the sentiments of this bigoted ecclesiastic were those of the Valencia barons ; who gave their vassals , on this melancholy occasion , every proof of generous compassion and humanity. By the royal edict they were entitled to all property belonging to their vassals , except what they were able to carry about their persons : but the barons , despising this right which the edict bestowed on them , allowed the Morecoes to dispose of whatever part of their effects could be sold for money , and likewise permitted them to convey their most valuable furniture and manufactures on mules and in carriages to the ships. Many of them accompanied their vassals in person to the shore , and some of them , having embarked along with them , saw them safely land on the coast of Africa¹⁸.

But this kind attention of the barons served only for a little time to mitigate their distress. Their exile from their native country , which justly excited in them the most bitter regret, and gave them so much ground for anxiety with regard to their future fortune, was soon succeeded by still greater calamities. Great numbers were shipwrecked on their passage, and never reached the African coast; while many others were barbarously murdered at sea, by the crews of the ships which they had freighted; this latter calamity befel only those who had chosen to transport themselves in private ships, and instances are recorded of such inhuman cruelty exercised against this harmless, persecuted, and defenceless people, by the owners and crews of these ships, as equals any thing of the same kind of which we read in history. The men butchered in the presence of their wives and children: the women and children afterwards thrown alive into the sea; of the women, some, on account of their beauty, preserved alive for a few days to satiate the lust of the inhuman murderers of their husbands and brothers, and then either slaughtered or committed to the waves; such were some of the horrid deeds of which these barbarians were convicted upon their trial to which they were brought, in consequence of quarrelling with each other about the division of their prey; and such, if we may credit a cotemporary historian, was the unhappy fate of a great number of the Moreos.

shore, than they were attacked by the Bedouin Arabs, a wild banditti who live in tents, and support themselves by hunting and by plunder. The Morescoes, unarmed, and incumbered with their wives and children, were often robbed by those barbarians, who came upon them in numerous bodies, amounting sometimes to five or six thousand men; and, as often as the Morescoes attempted, with stones and slings, their only arms, to make resistance, put great numbers of them to the sword. Still greater numbers perished of fatigue and hunger, joined to the inclemencies of the weather, from which they had no means of shelter, during their tedious journey through the African deserts, to Mostagan, Algiers, and other places, where they hoped to be permitted to take up their residence. Few of them ever arrived at these places. Of six thousand, who set out together from Conastal, a town in the neighbourhood of Oran, with an intention of going to Algiers, a single person only, of the name of Pedralvi, survived the disasters to which they were exposed; and of the whole hundred and forty thousand, who were at this time transported to Africa, there is ground to believe, from the concurring testimony of persons who had access to know the truth, that more than a hundred thousand men, women, and children, suffered death in its most hideous forms, within a few months after their expulsion from Valencia²⁰.

Compared to the dreadful fate to which this unhappy people were doomed by the Spaniards, it would have been an act of mercy on the part of the king, had he either commanded them to be put to the sword, or committed to the flames; as their misery would, in this case, have been of short continuance. The knowledge of what had befallen them ought, at least, to have deterred him from exposing the rest of his Moreisco subjects to the like calamities.

But the sentiments of humanity in the ecclesiastics and court of Spain were overpowered by those of the most illiberal superstition. They considered that inexpressible misery, which they themselves had brought on the Moreiscoes, as a signal of divine judgment against that unhappy people, which served to justify the cruelty which they had exercised, and to prove that what they had done was acceptable in the sight of God. Far from feeling remorse or sorrow for what had happened, they rather triumphed and exulted in it, and were confirmed in their resolution of expelling all the Moreiscoes in Spain without exception, and without thinking it incumbent on them to make provision for their reception in any of those countries to which they were about to be conveyed.

But before they proceeded to the expulsion of the Moreiscoes in Castile and other provinces, it was judged necessary to reduce to obedience all such of the Moreiscoes in Valencia, above mentioned, as had retired to the mountainous parts of that kingdom, with the resolution of standing on BOOK their defence. Their number, including men, 11.

1609. women, and children, amounted nearly to thirty thousand. Having collected together a considerable quantity of provisions of all kinds, they had begun, while the viceroy was employed in transporting their countrymen, to fortify themselves as well as they were able, and to block up the narrow passes by which the Spaniards must approach. But, besides being utterly destitute of military skill, they were extremely ill furnished both with arms and ammunition; and the folly of their attempt quickly appeared in the feebleness of every effort which they made to repel the attacks of the enemy. The viceroy having sent against them the flower of the regular forces, under the command of Don Augustin Mefica, who had acquired considerable military experience and renown in the wars of Flanders, a great part of them were compelled to surrender, through the want of water, from which Mefica had found means to cut them off; and soon after the rest were beaten from their intrenchments, and put to flight.

In the pursuit no mercy was shown, either to the aged or to the women and children, though rolling in the dust, and imploring mercy, by the savage conquerors. Upwards of three thousand perished²¹. The number of those who had surrendered was two-and-twenty thousand, who were all soon after transported to Africa, except the children under seven years of age, whom the soldiers were permitted to sell for slaves. The king decreed, that, after a certain number of years, they should be set at liberty; but, as many of them were sent to foreign countries, there is ground to suspect that the decree was not attended with the desired effect ²².

Another order of the king, which he published at this time, proved more effectual. Besides the Moreos who were killed or taken prisoners, a considerable number, distrustful of the Spanish faith,

Fueron Siguiendo la victoria, los nuestros, matando sin excecion, quantos alcançavan, viejos op moços, grandes, pequennos, hombres, y mugeres, por mas que arrodillados ellos, y ellas con los braços abiertos les pedian misericordia, no mereciendola los que siempre usaron mal della.—Fonseca, 310.

²² The viceroy and the archbishop of Valencia differed widely in their opinion with regard to the proper method of disposing of the children. The former represented to the king, that all of them, who were under fifteen years of age, might be safely permitted to remain in the hands of the Christians, to whom they had been sold by the soldiers, as there would be no Mahometans in the kingdom by whom they could be perverted from embracing the principles of the Christian faith. Besides, that as most of their parents and other relations had perished in the late insurrection, it would be less cruel to put them all to the sword, than to land so great a number of helpless young creatures on the coast of Barbary. The archbishop, on the other hand, declared that, after a certain age, no Moreos could possibly be converted; and that, if the Moreos children, at fifteen, at twelve, at ten, or even seven years of age, were suffered to remain,

B O O K or prompted by an unconquerable attachment to
IV. their native country, had dispersed themselves
1609. among the woods and rocks, where they hoped to elude the notice of the Spaniards. Philip put a price upon the heads of these unhappy men, and the soldiers were sent out to hunt for them, as for beasts of prey. Hardly any of them were able to escape. Some of them chose rather to die of cold and hunger than surrender themselves to the Spaniards; and at length their leader, who with his wife and children had concealed themselves in the most inaccessible parts of the mountains, was taken and carried alive to Valencia, where, after suffering much mockery and insult for having allowed himself to be elected king of the insurgents, he was, by a solemn sentence, condemned and put to death ²¹.

the whole kingdom of Valencia would again be peopled with Mahometans before the end of the second, or at most, of the third generation. The king, desirous to gratify both the viceroy and the archbishop, but leaning more to the side of the latter, gave his permission, as above mentioned, for retaining only such of the children as were under seven years of age.

²¹ In the Appendix (B) the reader will find other interesting circumstances relative to the condition of the Morescos in Spain, their expulsion and subsequent fate, collected from Sir Francis Cottington's Letters from Spain, 1609 and 1610.
